As this work follows rather closely upon the publication of Mr Donnelly's "Great Cryptogram," it may be as well, in order to avoid misconception, and any unjust charge of plagiarism (or unlawful desire to make capital out of the interest excited by the cipher problem)—to point out that as long ago as 1884, we published (under the auspices of Messrs Trübner & Co.), a work entitled "A New Study of Shakespeare." In it almost all the problems suggested in the present work are implied, and discussed at greater or less length. To belief in the Bacon authorship of the plays we have long been a convert, and a chapter on that subject may be refound in our first work. The theory that the plays and poems contain a planned spiritual Rebirth or promise of Revelation for posterity is the key-centre of "A New Study of Shakespeare." In it we attempted to suggest how that has been done, and representatively reflected in some of the plays. We therefore think we owe it to ourselves to lay claim to whatever originality there may be in that work, seeing that the time is rapidly approaching when the world must take a greater and more absorbing interest in these problems. We have no cipher (alas !) to present the reader, but pending the solution, or further elaboration of Mr Donnelly's Cryptogram, there are many ways still left open to the student desirous of a closer and deeper acquaintanceship with the art called Shakespeare's. Any letters or communications upon this subject may be addressed to the Author, through his publishers.

INTRODUCTION.

“But the Idols of the Market-place are the most troublesome of all: idols which have crept into the understanding through the alliances of words and names.”—BACON.

EVIDENCE differs as to weight, very much less in accordance with the evidence itself than with the capacities of the people receiving it. An apple falling is to Newton anticipation, supplying sufficient faith to discover and toil at the laws of gravitation. We may depend upon it, Newton not only saw, but believed because he saw. And how can this sort of evidence, with which the history of every discovery is replete, be made the vulgar sort of evidence which the average intellect requires before it is convinced? Take Mr Donnelly's recent work upon the authorship of the plays. Examine the first volume carefully, where the evidence is simply overwhelming. Do we think fifty such volumes would convince some people? A thousand times no! There is a large predominant class of people, who, to begin with, cannot grasp or seize the issues of comparative evidence at all. There is another large class whose minds are so infected with the idols of the Tribe, Theatre, and Den, as to be totally prepossessed and prejudiced against any rational weighing of the evidence when given. The human mind cannot hold two beliefs at the same time, or fairly examine evidence destructive of established faith, until the work is already partially accomplished by preparatory criticism. We see in the history of all great changes in matters of Religion or Philosophy, that the ground must be first cleared, the mind disabused or shaken in its idols, by a process of criticism, which is, as it were, a purge to drive out prepossessions. What is the sort of evidence that inspires men like Columbus, Galileo, or Newton with faith by its anticipation and prevision, to toil and labour in darkness, to risk danger and bear solitude unrecognised by their fellow-men? It cannot be the sort of evidence the noisy world requires, because it would be no evidence at all. Imagine Newton assuring the world that the laws of gravitation were prefigured by the fall of an apple! Or Columbus persuading us now-a-days of hemispheres unseen, from the simple analogy that fired his mind, that as the Mediterranean had a southern land limit in Africa, so ought the Atlantic to have some western boundary or terra firma! Yet these men were right, and their prevision and faith from what to them was conclusive evidence, worth all the knowing scepticism of the world put together. This, in short, is the history of discovery and invention, that certain minds like certain eyes on board a ship at sea, see land before others.

A great fallacy is that general consensus of opinion and length of time constitute a prerogative or standard of evidence. As if any millions or billions of uneducated, unreflecting persons, who take their opinions from hearsay, and just this fallacy of tradition, can weigh against one genuine expert, or one person who reflects, studies, and thinks beyond the general mind. Every day we hear something to the effect that three centuries have passed, and no one has (with a few rare exceptions) questioned the authorship of the plays.¹ Very true, but nobody even examined, or thought of examining, the evidence for or against this question, seriously, until lately. Ages have evolved, myriads of the human race gone below, who never questioned the Mosaic cosmogony, or the origin of man, as therein set down, until Darwin came with his theory. There have been thousands of surface critics of the plays, but no one has plumbed the question of why this mystery about Shakespeare's life—wherefore this silence—whence came his education—and thousands of other such questions? Because it is of comparatively recent date, that the profound classical learning, the enormous scholarship, the varied attainments, and the vast experience of Law, State, and Court life have been fully recognised or universally appreciated in the plays. The world is just commencing to realize that, joined to this enigma of mystery (which is too deliberate and too carefully planned to be the result of chance), there is, as it were, another side to the plays and poems—a profound, unrevealed side, that suggests a possible solution of the riddle. For there is a striking analogy between these plays and Nature, inasmuch as both hold the same reserve, the same secrecy, and the same silence, as if to say that no other revelation, save what they afford of themselves, shall be given.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, in one of his works, illustrates the disturbance produced by more light and new theories, by the picture of an old stone long imbedded in the grass, which in a moment of mischief we reverse with foot or stick. What a surprise for all the crawling and vermiculate things who have long dwelt in the land of darkness, so tranquilly and so comfortably! How they scurry and hurry away, anything but grateful for this influx of sunshine! Yet in a few months the spot is as green as the rest. And so it is with truth—somebody draws back the curtains of some old-established fallacy, some association of names with ideas, and nothing more, and lo, what an outcry is there at this pulling up the blinds from those who would like to sleep on for another century or so!

This applies particularly to the problem of the authorship of the Shakespeare plays, as well as to the art itself. A large class of people, particularly Englishmen, have taken the poet's works to themselves, and out of the mere association of the name of Shakespeare with the plays, not only imagine they are familiar with the author, but have built up an imaginary idol—a fictitious Shakespeare of their own who never existed—whom they fall down, worship, and defend as a person commensurate with the plays he is supposed to have written. The truth is, that whilst endeavouring to realize the personality of Shakespeare, we are always thinking of the works, and thus, out of the association of name and plays arises a Godlike being, who certainly does not answer to the little we know of him. Nothing is more powerful than the association of ideas. They usurp the place of reason, and become the "monster custom that all sense doth eat," for, let us ask the question, what proof have we (beyond the association of Shakespeare's name with the plays) that he wrote them? Suppose there was a reason for hiding—an object in mystifying posterity with regard to the real author. Why not? And granting this, where are your proofs that Shakespeare wrote these plays and poems? If it was not for the association of his name by tradition with the plays, and we were obliged to use our judgment or reason to select the real author, he is about the last person in the world we should light upon, and Bacon the first, who would stand out as the protagonist of his age, the rightful heir. The great difficulty is to persuade people that they know nothing of the personal Shakespeare at all, though they know certain works that have borne his name.

If it seems extraordinary that Bacon should lay no claim to his own works, it is far more extraordinary that Shakespeare should have been perfectly indifferent to the fate of his plays, or their publication in a collected form before his death! The fact that he leaves no personal record of himself, no scrip or scrap of writing, no manuscripts of the plays, no library, no correspondence, is so out of all power of expression wonderful, that to the profound thinker it constitutes a species of evidence in itself that it cannot be the result of indifference or accident, but is the outcome of deliberately planned intention to leave no trace outside the works themselves. The entire mystery surrounding the authorship of the plays and poems bears evidence of the most careful forethought and calculation. Common-sense will convince anybody that such complete removal of every trace of literary record and penmanship concerning an author, who is quite aware of his transcendent genius and coming fame in the eyes of posterity, cannot have been accidental! But suppose Shakespeare did not write the plays? Ah, then indeed, the less trace he left of himself the better! And perhaps this is just the reason we know so little about Shakespeare, inasmuch as there was very little about him worth knowing, except that, like the Ass in the comic poet's frogs, "he carries the mysteries":—

"Asinus portat mysteria."

Our theory—a theory we first put forth to the public, in the "New Study of Shakespeare"—is, that the plays and poems hitherto attributed to Shakespeare, contain decided proofs of a planned spiritual Rebirth or Revelation through time. An author planning a Revelation (and by this word we mean, the philosophy underlying the plays, together with the question of authorship) in a work of art, would first bethink himself of how to make this openly secret to another generation. There are certain symbolical signs which stand for types of Rebirth. Such is the fabulous bird the Phoenix. Another is the myth of Ceres and Proserpine—that is, the death of the earth life in Winter, and rebirth in Spring and Summer. In short, the only effective way, if possible, would be to give depth of meaning, which would be self-reflecting of the rebirth aimed at, so as to be as deep as Nature itself—that is, openly secret. This is the reason, we maintain, we find in plays like The Winter's Tale, the incorporated myth of Demeter and Persephone, very slightly disguised, though carefully veiled under the forms of Hermione and Perdita, applied to the art of the plays as art and rebirth of that art. We cannot enter here into the subject of the poet's works, as now understood. But it has been plain to all profound thinkers, that we know nothing of this art, but the mere outside—that, as Emerson put it, we are "still out of doors," and this is abundantly proved by the endless works which appear upon the plays and poems, of which not one, as yet, has advanced us one inch, upon any satisfactory path of discovery. Upon what spiritual and creative principles were they constructed? That they are mere plays, after the fashion of the plays of the Elizabethan age, cannot be for a moment accepted. There are no works upon Ben Jonson's art, or Beaumont and Fletcher's, after the fashion that we find upon the so-called Shakespeare plays. Their depth is so extraordinary, that we must not be surprised to find they embrace creative principles, which are hugely philosophic, as profound as Nature itself. The time will come, when all the world will marvel at the "composed wonder" of their frame—when libraries will be filled with lexicons to illustrate lines even in these plays—when the great interpreter of Nature's secrets, her great commentator, will be the "philosophic play systems" of Lord Bacon; and when the New World will look back upon the hitherto critics and commentators, with the pitying good-natured smile, that we bestow upon Bottom in the Dream, when he holds up his tiny lantern to illustrate Moonshine, or his bush of thorns to present the woods or sylva of Nature. To present the world with the sort of proof that a sceptical generation requires is impossible. The only conclusive proof upon a subject of this sort, is a cipher, beyond dispute, with a revelation following it of papers and evidence admitting neither question nor hesitation, and at once flooding the entire cycle of the plays and authorship with the splendour of Midsummer light. That this has been done and will follow at some time, we have no shadow of doubt. Whether Mr Donnelly will arrive at it, we cannot say, we only sincerely hope so, having the pleasure of his acquaintance, and knowing him to be a man as simple as he is true, as earnest and as laborious as he is conscientious, and above all suspicion of any sort of trifling or imposture in this matter.

Seeing that there is a poem entitled the Phoenix and the Turtle, (placed at the end of the works), plainly presenting an enigma and promise of rebirth, both in title and subject matter; seeing, again, that the Sonnets are so evidently creative principles or new life (Nuova Vita), and iterate a revelation through time so plainly; seeing that we have in Prospero a god in art, and in the Duke in Measure for Measure, an ubiquitous Providence presiding and directing, unseen and invisible, the ends of this art ; seeing that we have constantly presented to us separations and reconciliations with lost children like Marina and Perdita, (who bring about the reconciliations)—how is it, we ask, no one can see what has been done ? The mystery and obscurity that accompany the plays and their authorship were planned. It is too remarkable to be the result of chance. And the real author reveals himself in his favourite quotation, which he repeats at intervals throughout his works :—

“‘The glory of God is to conceal a thing, but the glory of the king is to find it out ;’ as if, according to the innocent play of children, the Divine Majesty took delight to hide His works, to the end to have them found out ; and as if kings could not obtain a greater honour than to be God’s playfellows in that game, considering the great commandment of wits and means whereby nothing needeth to be hidden from them.”

This is the key-note of Lord Bacon’s mind. This is the secret of the mystery and depth of plays which the God Bacon wrote, but concealed himself behind, under another name, in order to be found out through time and through depth of art—A SECOND NATURE ! See how in these lines Bacon delights in concealment ! It is this reserve of God and Nature which extracts his unbounded admiration. To be openly secret, to reserve nothing, yet to hide everything (like Nature), that indeed is Divine art ! Examine the history of Shakespearian criticism ? Does it not reveal just this mystery of concealment, this reserve, yet with the sense, (which everybody feels), that it is our incapacity alone, that (like Antony Dull) “understands nothing” ? We feel that this art is as profound as nature, and as philosophical. If it has a god in Prospero, and in the Duke in Measure for Measure, depend upon it it is also Godlike in creative principles and aims subserving its creation. All in it, we are told, is “hugely politic,” framed on “great bases for eternity,” and inspired by a transcendent self-sacrifice only equalled by Christ’s. For the sake of this end, for the sake of the mystery, Bacon has died in name, his glory being, (as he says, in the Sonnets) mostly that he is silent or dumb. We see this sacrifice hinted at in that strange work, Chester's "Love's Martyr," in the title, and in the after title, where the work is metaphorically applied to Nature, as imitation of nature, as "a rare piece of art" challenging Homer's. It is in this work we find the poem of the Phoenix and Turtle. It is not difficult to see that this work is the product of a secret society of men, contributing and assisting to one common end—the plays of Lord Bacon. This is our sincere belief. Everything in that work hints at secrecy, for fear of envy. We find in it the following pregnant words:—

" Guide, thou great guider of the Sun and Moon,
Thou elemental savourer of the night,
My undeserved wit, wit sprung too soon,¹
To give thy greatness every gracious light."

"Wit sprung too soon"—to be published or made manifest, evidently genius in advance of his age—which takes the only alternative left of imbedding and perpetuating itself by means of art. We find in the Sonnets evidence that there were associates or compeers, giving him aid by night in some task. Is it too much to suggest that we refind them in Chester's "Love's Martyr" ?—

" No, neither he, nor his compeers by night
Giving him aid, my verse astonished.
He, nor that affable familiar ghost
Which nightly gulls him with intelligence."

We know Shakespeare played the part of the Ghost in Hamlet, and that, as Ben Jonson states, he was of an "affable, open, and free disposition." Here, then, are two terms to identify him as the Ghost in Hamlet and as the Ghost behind the plays, who gulled himself with intelligence that belonged to another.

¹ Compare—

" As a decrepit father takes delight
To see his active child do deeds of youth,
So I, made lame by fortune's dearest spite."

—Sonnets.

We have in this work approached the Bacon-Shakespeare problem from a totally new point of view. We maintain that the question of the authorship of the plays is closely allied with the character and genius of Lord Bacon's life and writings. And we suggest that in the fact that he belonged to a secret society prefigured in his "New Atlantis," we have a key to the reserve and profound nature of his mind. Instead of vaguely speculating as to his motives for concealment, let us ask ourselves what was the nature of the secret society he belonged to? This may provide an answer to the entire problem. For the Rosicrucians called themselves Invisibles, their teaching was an abnegation or putting aside of all egotism, vanity, or self-seeking. They covered themselves with a cloud, and they professed doctrines which were dangerous to publish in an open form. Therefore it behoves us to seriously consider whether Bacon was one of them, or if not, to ask ourselves what was the society he really did belong to? We ought also to seriously consider the spiritual side of the plays and sonnets, and as we are dealing with an extraordinary Art, and an extraordinary genius, to ask ourselves what is the extraordinary rebirth, promised and set forth in no ambiguous terms in the Phoenix and Turtle, Chester's "Love's Martyr," and the Sonnets—everywhere? The greatest difficulty perhaps associated with this problem, is to persuade others that the plays have another, as yet, unrevealed side,—and that this side was written for posterity to discover. The silence, secrecy, mystery, and reserve are proofs of a planned system, which, as a whole, was that of a God in Art, sacrificing himself in order to conceal himself behind and in his works, whereby after-ages might have their curiosity and minds whetted to find him out, and give him the rebirth and glory for which he toiled?

Our theory, incredulous as it may seem, is that the works called Shakespeare's, are the product of a learned college of men, incorporated by one Divine Genius into a system of dramatised philosophy—an effort to realize Nature in dramatic art, and to carry down to another age the hermetic science of their society and of antiquity in a deliberately planned revelation. The actual sacrifice of authorship is part of this second story of Christ in art, for it is just the mystery and silence or reserve which has stimulated our curiosities, and which is so Godlike. It is written in the Sonnets over and over again—the sacrifice which is to be repaid in other ages ; the glory which is to spring mostly from the silence. When will the World begin to see it as we do ? That is our thought, for that the world will all at once see it, and wonder they never saw it before, is only a question of time. But how long ?

The following propositions are more or less implied in this work, and may be earnestly commended to the thoughtful student of this problem.

1. That Bacon was the founder or head of some secret society is prefigured by his "New Atlantis," and by a further array of minor evidence, contained in his works, life, and contemporary literature.

2. That John Heydon, a genuine Rosicrucian Apologist, identifies Bacon's "New Atlantis" with the "land of the Rosicrucians."

3. That the Rosicrucian manifestoes, fame, and rise correspond with Bacon's life and death. That four years after his death, 1630, the Rosicrucian literature is already upon the decline.

4. That the learned Nicolai, a great authority, and inquirer upon the origins of modern Freemasonry, claims Bacon to be its founder. That at the first authentic Lodge meeting at Warrington in 1646, Lord Bacon's Atlantis is discussed, his two columns or pillars (shown upon the Engravings of his Works, folio, Sylva Sylvarum) are adopted. Nicolai states the members of this meeting were all Rosicrucians, Elias Ashmole being one.

5. That the scheme put forward in some of the Rosicrucian manifestoes, bears the imprint of Bacon's mind and philosophy, or object of extending man's knowledge in nature by experiment. The overthrow of Aristotle being one feature.

6. That Modern Masonry is modified Rosicrucianism was the opinion of the learned De Quincey.

7. That Rosicrucianism, though apparently emanating from abroad, never took root there (vide De Quincey), but did in England,—a proof of its origin.

8. That it is clearly shown that the antedating of the inception of the fraternity with Christian Rosenkreutz was a splendid fiction, and that the real date of the society was coeval with the end of the sixteenth and commencement of the seventeenth centuries.

9. That the real authors of the “Universal Reformation” are still unknown, inasmuch as the supposed author, Johann Valentine Andreas, denied having anything to do with the brotherhood.

10. That Germany was no more the real centre of the Rosicrucians than Italy, seeing that we find a part of the “Universal Reformation” borrowed from Boccacini.

11. That Bacon’s writings give hints of profound intimacy with the Hermetic science, and mysteries of antiquity. That Bacon studied Egyptian, Persian, and Chaldean lore, which does not appear in his prose writings.

12. That he speaks of two methods of publishings, or of writing : one reserved, the other open ; one to select his reader, the other, oral, which falls in with the oral method of Freemasonry.

13. That he professes he is going the same road as the ancients, and compares himself to them in point of wit, which cannot apply to his prose works.

14. That Bacon’s works contain many implied enigmas and mysteries. That part of his works are wanting.

15. That the plays known as Shakespeare’s, contain evidence of Hermetic and Ancient Mystery sources — Rosicrucian or Masonic origins.

16. That the Sonnets are full of the promise of rebirth and revelation in almost extravagant terms.

CHAPTER I.

BACON'S "NEW ATLANTIS;" OR, "LAND OF THE ROSICRUCIANS."

"To come down hidden amongst crowds is sublime, To come down hidden amongst crowds from distant generations is doubly sublime."—DE QUINCEY.

If direct proof were necessary, that Bacon belonged, or was at the head of some secret society, it would seem as if the sort of proofs the sceptical world require were wanting. Yet just the sort of proof that the world cannot overlook, or blanch, is fortunately forthcoming in this case,—that is conclusive proof, given by almost a contemporary, not in a few words, but in an entire narrative, word for word, and line for line, with a few exceptions and changes, in names of places and people only. The "New Atlantis" of Bacon has always figured as a remarkable work,—but only to a very few minds, has it represented much beyond an ideal vision of an impossible Utopia or Republic. No doubt Masons have recognized signs of their craft in the College of the six days, in Solomon's House, and indeed Nicolai (an authority upon the subject) claims Bacon, not only to be the founder of modern Freemasonry, but a Rosicrucian. This we point out elsewhere. Nobody has ventured to deliberately affirm, that in the "New Atlantis," the society he hints at, is no other than the Rosicrucians themselves. The "New Atlantis" has been hitherto read as a visionary dream, but we now propose to place it before the public in a totally new light, as the secret society of men known by the name of the Rosicrucians, and of whom Bacon was probably the head. The discovery, we imagine, is so important, as to be impossible to over-estimate. For it throws a new light upon Bacon's life, his aims and his works, to say nothing that the so-called Shakespeare plays are included in the enigma. In our work, "A New Study of Shakespeare," we professed years ago, to have discovered the Rosicrucian character of the plays and poems. So keenly did we feel this that it is the real under-current of the whole book, particularly hinted at in certain chapters. We propose, therefore, to now present the public with the proofs. And first as to their source and head.

In a recent work, entitled the "Real History of the Rosicrucians," Mr A. E. Waite (the author), presents us with an examination, of the historical grounds, upon which the society first came into notice. Amongst the apologists, or defenders of the Rosicrucians, appears one John Heydon, whose works are well known to students of this class of subject. He appears to have been born a gentleman, "descended from a noble family of London," and very far from being a likely person to indulge in imposture or romance, for the sake of notoriety or unworthy fame. We refer (for want of space) the reader to Mr Waite's interesting work, where he will find many curious things about Heydon. We now propose to give Heydon's "Voyage to the Land of the Rosicrucians," side by side with Lord Bacon's "New Atlantis," whereby the extraordinary discovery will be made, that without an effort at disguise, these narratives go word for word, line by line, with each other, as perfect duplicates. The only difference existing, is that Heydon's Land is the Land of the Rosicrucians, and that a few names of places are altered.

Our first intention was to have given, the whole of Bacon's "New Atlantis," side by side with John Heydon's "Voyage to the Land of the Rosicrucians," and perhaps it had been better, if we could have effected this. But it would have added formidable dimensions to the plan of our work, and wearied the reader. There is no difference of any real importance as to text between the two narratives. The names are sometimes different—and the reader, has only to purchase Mr Waite's "Real History of the Rosicrucians" and collate Heydon's narrative with Bacon's "New Atlantis," to arrive at the conclusion they are identical narratives. It may be suggested, and of course will be suggested, that Heydon was an impostor, desiring to give importance, colouring, and romance, to the society to which he belonged, or pretended to belong, and seeking notoriety. Everything goes to contradict such a theory. In the "Life of John Heydon," written by Frederick Talbot, Esq., and prefixed to the "Wise Man's Crown," ✕ we read :—

"John Heydon, the son of Francis and Mary Heydon, now of Sidmouth in Devonshire, is not basely but nobly descended. Antiquaries derive them from Julius Heydon, King of Hungary and Westphalia, that were descended from the noble family of Cæsar Heydon in Rome, and since this royal race the line runs down to the Hon. Sir Christopher Heydon of Heydon, near Northwick; Sir John Heydon, late lord-lieutenant of the king's Tower of London, and the noble Chandlers in Worcestershire of the mother's side, which line spread by marriage into Devonshire, among the Collins, Ducks, Drues, and Bears. He had one sister, named Anne Heydon, who dyed two years since, his father and mother being yet living. He was born at his father's house in Green-Arbour, London, and baptized at S. Sepulchre's, and so was his sister, both in the fifth and seventh years of the reign of King Charles I. He was educated in Warwickshire, among his mother's friends, and so careful were they to keep him and his sister from danger, and to their books, that they had one continually to wait upon them, both to the school and at home.

"He was commended by Mr John Dennis, his tutor in Tardebick, to Mr George Linacre, priest of Cougheton, where he learned the Latine and Greek tongues. The war at this time began to molest the universities of this nation. He was then articled to Mr Michael Petty, an attorney at Clifford's Inn, with eighty pound, that at five years' end he should be sworn before Chief Justice Roll. Being very young, he applyed his minde to learning, and by his happy wit, obtained great knowledge in all arts and sciences. Afterwards he followed the armies of the King, and for his valour commanded in the troops. When he was by these means famous for learning and arms, he travelled into Spain,

Italy, Arabia, Ægypt, and Persia, gave his minde to writing, and composed, about twenty years since, 'The Harmony of the World.'

His character appears to have been a high one, if we can believe this writer :—

"He writes now from Hermeupolis, a place I was never at. It seems, by the word, to be the City of Mercury, and truly he hath been in many strange places, among the Rosie Crucians, and at their castles, holy houses, temples, sepulchres, sacrifices; all the world knows this gentleman studies honourable things, and faithfully communicates them to others; yet, if any traduce him hereafter, they must not expect his vindication. He hath referred his quarrel to the God of Nature; it is involved in the concerns of his truths, and he is satisfied with the peace of a good conscience. He hath been misinterpreted in his writing; with studied calumnies, they disparage his person whom they never saw, nor perhaps will see. He is resolved for the future to suffer, for he says, 'God condemns no man for his patience.' His enemies are forced to praise his vertue, and his friends are sorry he hath not ten thousand pounds a year. He doth not resent the common spleen; and when the world shall submit to the general tribunal, he will find his advocate where they shall find their judge. When I writ this gentleman's life, God can bear me witness, it was unknown to him, and for no private ends. I was forced to it by a strong admiration of the mistery and majesty of Nature written by this servant of God and secretary of Nature. I began his life some years since, and do set it down as I do finde it. If any man oppose this I shall answer; if you are for peace, peace be with you; if you are for war, I have been so too (Mr Heydon doth resolve never to draw sword again in England, except the King command him). Now, let not him that puts on the armour boast like him that puts it off. Gaudet patientia duris is his motto, and thus I present myself a friend to all artists, and enemy to no man."

We have made no particular selections from the "New Atlantis" of Bacon, or of Heydon's narrative. Both the accounts might, and ought, to stand side by side, from first to last, and our choice is a random one, falling upon those paragraphs, which bring in the name of the Rosicrucians or Rosy Cross. It is to be hoped that the critic, will at once test the truth of our statement at its fountain head, and convince himself without delay. It appears Heydon lived after Bacon. A study of his narrative in the original, will convince the critic Heydon was a fellow of the society, and knew what he was writing about. At least that is our belief.

HEYDON'S "VOYAGE TO THE LAND OF THE ROSICRUCIANS."

"The morrow after our three dayes, there came to us a new man, cloathed in azure, save that his turban was white with a small red crosse at the top. He had also a tippet of fine linnen. He did bend to us a little, and put his arms broad; we saluting him in a very lowly manner. He desired to speak with some few of us, whereupon six onely stayed, and the rest avoided the room. He said:—'I am by office governour of this house of strangers, and by vocation a Christian priest of the Order of the Rosie Crosse, and am come to offer you my service, as strangers and chiefly as Christians. The State, hath given you licence to stay on land for the space of six weeks, and let it not trouble you if your occasions ask further time, for the law in this point is not precise. Ye shall also understand that the strangers' house is at this time rich and much aforehand, for it hath laid up revenue these 36000 years—so long it is since

"The morrow after our three days were past, there came to us a new man that we had not seen before, clothed in blue as the former was, save that his turban was white, with a small red cross on the top; he had also a tippet of fine linen. At his coming in he did bend to us a little, and put his arms abroad. We of our parts saluted him in a very lowly and submissive manner, as looking that from him we should receive sentence of life or death. He desired to speak with some few of us; whereupon six of us only stayed, and the rest avoided the room. He said: 'I am by office governor of this House of Strangers, and by vocation I am a Christian priest; and therefore am come to you to offer you my service both as strangers, and chiefly as Christians. Some things I may tell you, which I think you will not be unwilling to hear. The state hath given you licence to stay on land for the space of six weeks. And let it not trouble

As for any merchandize ye have brought, ye shall be well used, and have your return either in merchandize or gold and silver, for to us it is all one. If you have any other request to make, hide it not, onely this I must tell you that none of you must go above a juld, or karan (that is with them a mile and an half), from the walls of the city without especial leave.'"

““Lord God of Heaven and earth, Thou hast vouchsafed of Thy grace to those of our order to know Thy works of creation and the secrets of them, and to discern (as far as appertaineth to the generation of men) between divine miracles, works of Nature, works of art, and impostures and illusions of all sorts. you if your occasions ask further time, for the law in this point is not precise ; and I do not doubt but myself shall be able to obtain for you such further time as shall be convenient. Ye shall also understand that the Strangers'-House is at this time rich and much aforehand, for it hath laid up revenue these thirty-seven years ; for so long it is since any stranger arrived in this part. And, therefore, take ye no care, the state will defray you all the time you stay, neither shall you stay one day less for that. As for any merchandise you have brought, ye shall be well used, and have your return either in merchandise, or in gold and silver ; for to us it is all one. And if you have any other request to make, hide it not, for ye shall find we will not make your countenance to fall by the answer ye shall receive. Only this I must tell you, that none of you must go above a karan [that is with them a mile and a half] from the walls of the city without special leave.”

we now see is Thy finger and a true miracle. And for as much as we learn in our books that Thou never workest miracles but to a divine and excellent end (for the laws of Nature are Thine own laws, and Thou exceedest them not but upon great cause), we most humbly beseech Thee to prosper this great signe, and to give us the interpretation and use of it in mercy, which Thou doest in some part promise by sending it unto us."

"When he had made his prayer, he presently found the boat he was in unbound, whereas the rest remained still fast. Taking that for leave to approach, he caused the boat to be softly rowed towards the pillar, but ere he came near the pillar and crosse of light brake up, and cast itself abroad into a firmament of many stars, which also soon vanished, and there was nothing left but a small ark of cedar, not wet at all with water, though it swam. In the fore-end of it grew a small green branch of palme, and when the Rosie Crucian had taken it with all reverence into his boat, it opened of itself, and there were found a book and letter, both written in fine parchment, and wrapped in suidons of linnen, the book containing all the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, according as you have them, while the Apocalypse itself and some other books of the New

"When he had made his prayer, he presently found the boat he was in moveable and unbound, whereas all the rest remained still fast; and taking that for an assurance of leave to approach, he caused the boat to be softly and with silence rowed towards the pillar: but ere he came near it, the pillar and cross of light brake up, and cast itself abroad, as it were, into a firmament of many stars; which also vanished soon after, and there was nothing left to be seen but a small ark or chest of cedar, dry, and not wet at all with water, though it swam; and in the fore-end of it, which was towards him, grew a small green branch of palm. And when the wise man had taken it with all reverence into his boat, it opened of itself, and there was found in it a book and a letter, both written in fine parchment, and wrapped in sindons of linen. "At the same time, the inhabitants of the Holy Land did flourish. For though the narration and description made by a great man with you, that the descendants of Neptune planted there, and of the magnificent temple, palace, city, and hill (see my Rosicrucian Infallible Axiomata), and the manifold navigable rivers (which as so many chains environed the site and temple), and the severall degrees of ascent whereby men did climb up to the same as if it had been a Scala Cæli, be all poetical and fabulous, yet so much is true that the said country of Judea, as well as Peru, then called Coya—Mexico, then named Tyrambel—were mighty, proud kingdoms in arms, shipping, and riches. At one time both made two great expeditions, they of Tyrambel through Judea to the Mediterranean sea, and they of Coya through the South Sea upon this our island."

"At the same time, and an age after or more, the inhabitants of the great Atlantis did flourish. For though the narration and description which is made by a great man, with you, of the descendants of Neptune planted there, and of the magnificent temple, palace, city, and hill, and the manifold streams of goodly navigable rivers, which, as so many chains, environed the same site and temple, and the severall degrees of ascent, whereby men did climb up to the same, as if it had been a scala cæli, be all poetical and fabulous; yet so much is true, that the said country of Atlantis, as well as that of Peru, then called Coya, as that of Mexico, then named Tyrambel, were mighty and proud kingdoms in arms, shipping, and riches; so mighty, as at one time, or at least within the space of ten years, they both made two great expeditions: they of Tyrambel through the Atlantic to the Mediterranean Sea, and they of Coya, through the South Sea, upon this our island."

the excellent acts of that King one hath the pre-eminence—the erection and institution of an Order, or Society, which we call the Temple of the Rosie Crosse, the noblest foundation that ever was upon earth, and the lanthorne of this Kingdome. It is dedicated to the study of the works and creatures of God. Some think it beareth the founder's name a little corrupted, as if it should be F. H. R. I take it to be denominate of the King of the Hebrews, which is famous with you, and no stranger to us, for we have some parts of his works which you have lost, namely, that Rosie Crucian M which he wrote of all things past, present, or to come, and of all things that have life and motion. This maketh me think that our King finding himself to symbolize with that King of the Hebrews, honoured him with The Title of this Foundation, and I finde in ancient records this Order or Society of the Rosie Crosse is sometimes called the Holy House, and sometimes the Colledge of the Six Days' Works, whereby I am satisfied that our excellent King had learned from the Hebrews that God had created the world and all therein within six days, and therefore he instituting that House for the finding out of the one nature of things did give it also that second name. When the King had forbidden to all his friends, that amongst the excellent acts of that king, one above all hath the pre-eminence. It was the erection and institution of an order or society, which we call Solomon's House, the noblest foundation, as we think, that ever was upon the earth, and the lantern of this kingdom. It is dedicated to the study of the works and creatures of God. Some think it beareth the founder's name a little corrupted, as if it should be Solomona's House; but the records write it as it is spoken. So as I take it to be denominate of the king of the Hebrews, which is famous with you, and no stranger to us, for we have some parts of his works which with you are lost; namely, that natural history which he wrote of all plants, 'from the cedar of Lebanon to the moss that groweth out of the wall,' and of all things that have life and motion. This maketh me think that our king, finding himself to symbolize in many things with that king of the Hebrews which lived many years before him, honoured him with the title of this foundation. And I am the rather induced to be of this opinion, for that I find in ancient records this order or society is sometimes called Solomon's House, and sometimes the Colledge of the Six Days' Works; whereby I am satisfied that our excellent king had learned from the Hebrews that God had created the world, and all that therein is, within six

"The Father of the fraternity, whom they call the R. days, and therefore he instituting that house for the finding out of the true nature of all things, whereby God might have the more glory in the workmanship of them, and men the more fruit in their use of them, did give it also that second name. But now, to come to our present purpose. When the king had forbidden to all his people navigation in any part that was not under his crown, he made nevertheless this ordinance, that every twelve years there should be set forth out of this kingdom two ships appointed to several voyages; that in either of these ships there should be a mission of three of the fellows or brethren of Solomon's House, whose errand was only to give us knowledge of the affairs and state of those countries to which they were designed, and especially of the sciences, arts, manufactures."

"The father of the family, whom they call the tirsan, two days before the feast, taketh to him three of such friends as he liketh to choose, and is assisted also by the governor of the city or place where the feast is celebrated; and all the persons of the family of both sexes are summoned to attend him. These two days the tirsan sitteth in consultation concerning the good estate of the family. vice, they are reprov'd and censur'd. So, likewise, direction is given touching marriage and the courses of life. The governour assisteth to put in execution the decrees of the Tirsan if they should be disobey'd, though that seldome needeth, such reverence they give to the order of Nature. The Tirsan doth also then chuse one man from amongst his sons to live in house with him, who is called ever after the Sonne of the Vine. On the feast day the father, or Tirsan, cometh forth after Divine Service in to a large room, where the feast is celebrated, which room hath an half-pace at the upper end."

"As we were thus in conference, there came one that seemed to be a messenger, in a rich huke, that spake with the Jew, whereupon he turned to me and said, 'You will pardon me, for I am commanded away in haste.' The next morning he came to me joyfully, and said—'There is word come to the Governour of the city that one of the Fathers of the Temple of the Rosie Crosse, or Holy House, will be here this

So likewise, direction is given touching marriages, and the courses of life which any of them should take, with divers other the like orders and advices. The governor assisteth to the end, to put in execution by his public authority the decrees and orders of the tirsan, if they should be disobey'd, though that seldome needeth, such reverence and obedience they give to the order of nature. The tirsan doth also then ever choose one man from amongst his sons to live in house with him, who is called ever after the son of the vine: the reason will hereafter appear. I thanked him and said I was most glad of the news. The day being come, he made his entry. He was a man of middle stature and age, comely of person, and had an aspect as if he pitied men. He was clothed in a robe of fine black cloth, with wide sleeves and a cape. His under garment was of excellent white linnen, down to the foot, with a girdle of the same, and a sindon or tippet of the same about his neck. He had gloves that were curious and set with stones, and shoes of peach-coloured velvet. His neck was bare to the shoulders; his hat was like a helmet, or Spanish montera,¹ and his locks, of brown colour, curled below it decently. ¹ Can we not recognize Bacon in this portrait, so familiar to us in the folios of his works (particularly the "Sylva Sylvarum"), where he is represented with a Spanish Montera? He is described (in Kennet, ii. p. 736) as follows:—"He was of a 'middling stature;' his countenance had indented with age before he was old; his presence grave and 'comely,' says Arthur Wilson." Here are the same words used as in the "New Atlantis," "middle stature" and "comely." But the portrait is unmistakably meant for Bacon, inasmuch as he addresses his audience as "my son," or "sons," which is repeated in Bacon's works, where one of his titles is ad filios suos. Lloyd (in his "State Worthies," ii. p. 121) says, "His make and port was stately." "He had a delicate lively hazel eye" (Dr Harvey). He was childless. Bacon is evidently presented here as the father or head of the fraternity.

We use them also sometimes for cureing some diseases, and for prolongation of life in hermits that choose to live there, well accommodated of all things necessary, by whom also we learn many things (read our "Temple of Wisdome"). We have burials in several earths, where we put diverse cements, as the Chineses do their borcellane; but we have them in greater variety, and some of them more fine. We have also great variety of composts and soyles for the making of the earth fruitfull. These caves we call "the lower region," and we use them for all coagulations, indurations, refrigerations, and conservations of bodies. We use them likewise for the imitation of natural mines, and the producing also of new artificial metals, by compositions and materials which we use and lay there for many years. We use them also sometimes (which may seem strange) for curing of some diseases, and for prolongation of life in some hermits that choose to live there, well accommodated of all things necessary, and, indeed, live very long; by whom also we learn many things.

We have harmonies (read the "Harmony of the World") which you have not, of quarter and lesser kinds of sounds—divers instruments of musick to you unknown, some sweeter than any you have, together with bells and rings that are dainty and sweet. (See my book of "Geomancy and Telesmes.") We represent small sounds as great and deep, great sounds as extenuate and sharpe; we make divers tremblings and warblings of sounds which in their originall are entire. We represent and imitate all articulate sounds and letters (read my "Cabbala, or Art, by which Moses shewed so many signs in Ægypt"), and the voices and notes of many beasts and birds. We have certain helps which, set to the ear, do further the hearing greatly. We have strange and artificiall echos, reflecting the voice many times, and, as it were, to sing it, some that give back the voice louder than it came, some shriller, some deeper, some rendring the voice differing in the letters, or articular sound, from that they receive. We have also means to convey sounds in trunks and pipes, in strange lines and distances." ¹ visits of divers principal cities of the kingdome, where we doe publish such news, profitable inventions, as we think good, and we doe also declare natural divinations of diseases, plagues, swarms of hurtfull creatures, scarcity, tempests, earthquakes, great inundations, comets, temperature of the year, and divers other things, and we give counsel thereupon for the prevention and remedy of them.'

"When he had said this, he desired me to give him an account of my life, that he might report it to the Brethren of the Rosie Crosse, after which he stood up; I kneeled down, and he laid his right hand upon my head, saying, 'God blesse thee, my son, and God blesse these relations which we have made! I give thee leave to publish them for the good of other nations, for we are here in God's bosome, a land unknown.'

"And so he left me, having assigned a value of about two thousand pounds in gold for a bounty to me and my fellows, for they give great largesses where they come upon all occasions."

Now, either Heydon was an impostor, who borrowed Bacon's "Atlantis" to give colour to his pretences, or a real Rosicrucian, in which case he knew the truth. He has always been considered and classed as a genuine Rosicrucian apologist. His other works and his reputation all go in favour of his being above any trickery.

It seems to us we can find traces of Bacon's mind in the "Fama Fraternitatis," or "Universal Reformation," which appears to have been first published in 1614. This is the famous declaravisits of divers principal cities of the kingdom, where, as it cometh to pass, we do publish such new profitable inventions as we think good. And we do also declare natural divinations of diseases, plagues, swarms of hurtful creatures, scarcity, tempests, earthquakes, great inundations, comets, temperature of the year, and divers other things; and we give counsel thereupon what the people shall do for the prevention and remedy of them.'

"And when he had said this, he stood up; and I, as I had been taught, kneeled down, and he laid his right hand upon my head, and said, 'God bless thee, my son, and God bless this relation which I have made; I give thee leave to publish it for the good of other nations, for we here are in God's bosom, a land unknown.' And so he left me, having assigned a value of about two thousand ducats for a bounty to me and my fellows; for they give great largesses where they come upon all occasions."

tion, which first revealed to the public, the existence of the Rosicrucians. The original edition contained a manifesto, with the title, "The Fama Fraternitatis, or the meritorious order of the Rosy Cross, addressed to the learned in general, and the governours of Europe."—"It was reprinted," says Mr Waite (in his interesting history of the Rosicrucians), "with the 'Confessio Fraternitatis' and the 'Allgemeine Reformation der Ganzen Welt,' at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1615." We find the following passage throwing contempt upon Aristotle and Galen:—

The "Fama Fraternitatis; or, a Discovery of the Fraternity of the most Laudable Order of the Rosy Cross."

"Seeing the only wise and merciful God in these latter days hath poured out so richly His mercy and goodness to mankind, whereby we do attain more and more to the perfect knowledge of His Son Jesus Christ, and of Nature, that justly we may boast of the happy time wherein there is *not only discovered unto us the half part of the world,*¹ which was heretofore unknown and hidden, but He hath also made manifest unto us many wonderful and never-heretofore seen works and creatures of Nature, and, moreover, hath raised men, indued with great wisdom, which might partly renew and reduce all arts (in this our spotted and imperfect age) to perfection, so that finally man might thereby understand his own nobleness and worth, and why he is called Microcosmus, and how far his knowledge extendeth in Nature.

"Although the rude world herewith will be but little pleased, but rather smile and scoff thereat; also the pride and covetousness of the learned is so great, it will not suffer them to agree together; but were they united, they might, out of all those things which in this our age God doth so richly bestow on us, collect Librum Naturæ, or, a Perfect Method of all Arts. But such is their opposition that they still keep, and are loth to leave, the old course, esteeming Porphyry, Aristotle, and Galen, yea, and that which hath but a meer show of learning, more than the clear and manifested Light and Truth."

Now, there is Bacon's mind very strongly emphasized in three separate points in this passage. The first is Bacon's master thought, that the mind should make discoveries of new worlds, to parallel the discovery of America. From this idea, which he gives vent to in words to James I.,¹ sprang his ship device and its motto, plus ultra, sailing as it is (a precious argosy), between and beyond the pillars of Hercules. Then, again, the entire Baconian philosophy, or system, as works applied to Nature, is comprised in the words, "how far his knowledge extendeth in Nature." In Bacon's age, there were not many, who like him, distinctly realized the difference of vain words, from "knowledge in Nature." It is the pith of his philosophy,—the progenitor of the Inductive method,—and its master key is application to Nature, to realize our knowledge in Nature. We also find in the above passage, disparagement of Aristotle. To mention this name is to recall Bacon's early and constant dislike of him and his school. The first striking record we have of Bacon, is his falling out, at a ridiculously early age with the stagirite. Thus we have the three main points of Bacon's mind, coming all together, for the overthrow of Aristotle, was with him, preparation only, for new discoveries in a new hemisphere of thought, that should extend, to experiments in Nature herself. Joined to all this, which indeed, was part of it, he had an unbounded love of humanity—a philanthropy so universal that it is almost unnatural, and incredible, except in a God or Christ. He lives for after ages—for posterity, "after a little time be passed," in order to procure the "good of all men." Now this falls in exactly with the spirit, betrayed in these early manifestoes, which accompany the first tidings we have of the famous Brotherhood, and their scheme of "Universal Reformation." This is entirely Baconian. And I am sure, that everybody who has read and studied him lovingly, will agree with us, that the whole aim of his life, and mind, was the good of others, and that in this, he resembled God, for he saw that it was good. He was prepared for any sacrifice, for any trouble, for this end. It is writ large, from the earliest childhood of this marvellous man, who hardly seemed born, before he was compassing ways and means, to lift mankind out of the slough, and the vicious circles, of the schoolmen and middle ages. Such a scheme as the "Universal Reformation" required a more than remarkable man to imagine it, far more to carry it out. It wanted place, power, a man of many tongues, and the refinement of high culture to start the idea, of a secret society all over Europe, for the bettering of the times. But it could not be done openly—the envy, danger, evil of the world at that time can hardly be realized to us now. Mr Waite truly remarks—

"Beneath the broad tide of human history there flow the stealthy undercurrents of the secret societies, which frequently determine in the depths the changes that take place upon the surface."

The "undercurrents of secret societies" are most powerful for good, because they lie in the hearts of men—and make up for want of open force, by a brotherhood of craft, which the common danger binds them to maintain and propagate to others. We find this constantly hinted at by Bacon. He deploras the universal insanity, and declares to his son, that it is only increased by resistance, and that Truth ought to be, but cannot be openly inculcated. Therefore he says "we must conform to the Universal Insanity." But how? We believe the reply is to be found in what we suggest and in what we have hinted to us in the "New Atlantis."

The Founders of Rosicrucianism.

With regard to the mythical story connected with the foundation of the secret Brotherhood or order of the Rosy Cross—the story of the death, burial, and opening of Christian Rosencreutz's tomb—Mr Waite disposes of it summarily in his recent "Real History of the Rosicrucians."

"Taking 1614 as the year when the 'Fama' was published, and supposing the discovery of the burial-place to have antedated the manifesto by the shortest possible period, we are brought back to the year 1494, one year after the birth of Paracelsus, whose books it is supposed so contain. This point is, of course, conclusive, and it is unnecessary to comment on the mystery which surrounds the ultimate fate of the corpse of that 'godly and high-illuminated Father, Brother C. R. C.'

"Thus it is obvious that the history of Christian Rosencreutz is not historically true, and that the Society did not originate in the manner which is described by the 'Fama.'"

Now here we have at once positive proof of the fraudulent history and antedating of the origin of the society. This fact goes a long way to harbour the suspicion, that the real origin of the society was coeval with the end of the sixteenth, and early part of the seventeenth century—Bacon's manhood. Mr Waite says:—

"The Rosicrucian theorists may be broadly divided into three bands—I. Those who believe that the history of Christian Rosencreutz is true in fact, and that the society originated in the manner recounted in the 'Fama Fraternitatis.' II. Those who regard both the society and its founder as purely mythical, and consider with Liebnitz, 'que tout ce que l'on a dit des Frères de la Croix de la Rose, est une pure invention de quelque personne ingénieuse.' III. Those who, without accepting the historical truth of the story of Rosencreutz, believe in the existence of the Rosicrucians as a secret society, which drew attention to the fact of its existence by a singular and attractive fiction."

So, taking Mr Waite as our authority, we propose to briefly examine the evidence with him, as to the historical truth of the myth, around which the founding of the society is associated.

In this history of the "Fama" we arrive at the first inception of the society:—

"After this manner began the Fraternity of the Rosie Cross—first, by four persons onely, and by them was made the magical language and writing, with a large dictionary, which we yet dayly use to God's praise and glory, and do finde great wisdom therein. They made also the first part of the Book M, but in respect that that labour was too heavy, and the unspeakable concourse of the sick hindred them, and also whilst his new building (called Sancti Spiritus) was now finished, they concluded to draw and receive yet others more into their Fraternity. To this end was chosen Brother R. C., his deceased father's brother's son; Brother B., a skilful painter; G. G., and P. D., their secretary, all Germaines except I. A., so in all they were eight in number, all batchelors and of vowed virginity, by whom was collected a book or volumn of all that which man can desire, wish, or hope for."—(Waite's "Real History of the Rosicruciana.")

Who is this Brother B., a skilful painter or Artist? B. stands suspiciously for Bacon. It is perfectly true this history is antedated two centuries prior to Bacon's times. But we shall show that before 1614, when this "Fama" was published, nothing had been heard of this brotherhood, or of this mythical history of Father Rosycross. And Mr Waite seems to incline to the suspicion, that the entire story was a fabrication manufactured to give an air of romance, reality, and attraction to the world, in an age when these things acted powerfully upon the minds of men in Europe,—and to thus gain credit, authority, and power. Among the members inscribed in the vault where the body of Christian Rosenkreutz lay under the altar, are these names:—

1. Fra. I. A. Fra. C. H. electione Fraternitatis caput.
2. Fra. G. V. M. P. C.

3. Fra. F. R. C., Junior hæres S. Spiritus.
4. Fra. F. B. M. P. A., Pictor et Architectus.
5. Fra. G. G. M. P. I., Cabalista.

No. 4. F. B. M. P. A. stands suspiciously for Francis Bacon, Magister, Pictor et Architectus. Note this is Brother B., a "skilful painter," evidently identical with the "Pictor et Architectus," not F. B. M. but F. B. only, the M. being either Magister, or for some other title.

To those who believe that Bacon wrote the plays ascribed to Shakespeare, and who also believe, like ourselves, that he was the Master Spirit, who was the founder and the originator of the Rosicrucians, the words PICTOR ET ARCHITECTUS are sufficiently startling. We find plenty of authority in the sonnets to couple the playwright's art with the painter's. And here it is. (Sonnet 24.)

"Perspective it is best painter's art.
For through the painter must you see his skill."

"Like perspectives which show things inward when they are, but paintings."—(Bacon's "Nat. Hist. Cent.," i. 98.)

(Sonnet 24.)

"Mine eye hath play'd the painter and hath stell'd
Thy beauty's form in table of my heart."

We have supposed that the reader is well acquainted with the celebrated "Fama Fraternalitatis," either through De Quincey, or through some other source, like Mr Waite's "Real History of the Rosicrucians," to which we are deeply indebted. It would be impossible to reproduce here the whole account, so must beg the reader to go to the originals, or the works mentioned, and then return to us.

We now proceed to maintain that the antedating of this fabulous tale of Christian Rosenkreutz was a splendid fiction, first for safety's sake; secondly, as we have said, to give romance, interest, and colour to the origins of the society. Our own conviction is that the society in the form presented to us in the "Fama Fraternitatis" never existed at all, or at least only a few years before its publication. Here are the grounds.

First, that we find John Heydon's narrative of "a voyage to the land of the Rosicrucians" is a facsimile repetition of Bacon's "New Atlantis." Secondly, that Johann Valentin Andreas, to whom the composition of the Rosicrucian manifestoes are attributed, never viewed them seriously himself, but called the "Chymical Marriage of Christian Rosencreutz" (round which the question of authorship and founding of the order to a great extent revolves) a ludibrium or farce, and this is entirely contrary to the spirit of the publications and earnest character of the "Universal Reformation." Thirdly, it is stated that Andreas wrote the "Chymical Marriage" at the early age of sixteen, which Mr Waite considers quite unacceptable. Indeed, Mr Waite, in the spirit of an impartial historical judge, seems to think that the "Fama Fraternitatis" issued from some other source. This is what he writes:—

"I. The 'Chymical Marriage' is called a ludibrium by its author, and Professor Buhle describes it as a comic romance, but those of my readers who are acquainted with alchemical allegories will discern in this singular narrative by a prepared student or artist who was supernaturally and magically elected to participate in the accomplishment of the magnum opus, many matters of grave and occult significance. They will recognise that the comic episodes are part of a serious design, and that the work as a whole is in strict accordance with the general traditions of alchemy. They will question the good faith of the author in the application of a manifestly incongruous epithet. Perhaps they will appear to be wise above what is written, but the position is not really unreasonable, for the passage in which reference is made by Andreas to the 'Nuptiæ Chymicæ' is calculated to raise suspicion. He was a shrewd and keen observer; he had gauged the passions and the crazes of his period; he was fully aware that the rage for alchemy blinded the eyes and drained the purses of thousands of credulous individuals, who were at the mercy of the most wretched impostors, and that no pretence was too shallow, and no recipe too worthless, to find believers. He could not be ignorant that a work like the 'Chymical Marriage of Christian Rosencreutz' was eminently liable to impose upon every class of theosophists. When, therefore, he supposes, and, by implication, expresses, astonishment that his so-called ludibrium became the object of earnest investigation and of high esteem, I freely confess that I, for one, cannot interpret him seriously; in other words, that I reject the statement. This, however, is only the initial difficulty. The same passage of the 'Vita ab ipso Conscripta' contains another piece of incredible information, namely, that Andreas wrote the 'Nuptiæ Chymicæ' before he was sixteen. This story gives evidence of an acquaintance with the practice and purposes of alchemy which was absolutely impossible to the most precocious lad. Moreover, the boldness of its conception, and the power which is displayed in its execution, setting aside the debateable question of its occult philosophical character, are things utterly transcending the cacoethes scribendi of a youngster barely attained to the age of puberty. I appeal to the discrimination of my readers whether the curious and ingenious perplexities propounded at the supper on the third day are in any way suggestive of 'the light fire in the veins of a boy.' The romance supposed to have been written in 1602-3 did not see the light till 1616,¹ when it appeared in the full tide of the Rosicrucian controversy. Why did it remain in manuscript for the space of thirteen years at a period when everything treating of alchemy was devoured with unexampled avidity? The 'Chymical Marriage,' in its original draft, may have been penned at the age of fifteen, but it must have been subjected to a searching revision, though I confess that it betrays no trace of subsequent manipulation. These grave difficulties are enhanced by a fact which is wholly unknown to most Rosicrucian critics, and which was certainly not to be expected in the jest of a schoolboy, namely, that the barbarous enigmatical writings which are to be found in several places of 'The Hermetick Wedding,' are not an unmeaning hoax, but contain a decipherable and deciphered sense. The secretary of an English Rosicrucian Society says that the Supreme Magus of the Metropolitan College can read all three of the enigmas, and that he himself has deciphered two. Their secret is not a tradition, but the meaning dawns upon the student after certain researches. The last point is curious, and, outside the faculty of clairvoyance, the suggested method does not seem probable, but I give it to be taken at its worth, and have no reason to doubt the statement.

"From these facts and considerations the conclusion does not seem unreasonable, and may certainly be tolerated by an impartial mind, that, in spite of the statement of Andreas, the 'Chymical Marriage' is not a ludibrium, that it betrays a serious purpose, and conceals a recondite meaning.

"II. With this criticism the whole theory practically breaks down. We know that the 'Fama Fraternitatis' was published in 1615, as a manifesto of the 'Bruderschaft des löblichen Ordens des Rosen Creutzes.' We have good reason to suppose that the original draft of the 'Chymical Marriage' was tampered with; we do not know that previous to the year 1615 such a work was in existence as the 'Chymical Marriage of Christian Rosencreutz.' What we know to have existed was simply the 'Nuptiæ Chymicæ.' Now, supposing the 'Fama Fraternitatis' to have emanated from a source independent of Andreas, he would be naturally struck by the resemblance of the mysterious Rosicrucian device to his own armorial bearings, and when in the year 1616 he published his so-called comic romance, this analogy may, not inconceivably, have led him to re-christen his hero, and to introduce those passages which refer to the Rose Cross. This, of course, is conjectural, but it is to be remarked that so far as can be possibly ascertained, the acknowledged symbol of the Fraternity never was a St Andrew's Cross with four Roses, but was a Cross of the ordinary shape, with a Red Rose in the centre, or a Cross rising out of a Rose. There is therefore little real warrant for the identification of the mystical and the heraldic badge. It is on this identification, however, that the Andrean claim is greatly based.

"III. We find the 'Chymical Marriage,' like the 'Fama' and 'Confessio Fraternitatis,' crusading against the 'vagabond cheaters,' 'runagates and roguish people,' who debased alchemical experiments in the interest of dishonest speculation; yet the one, under a thin veil of fiction, describes the proceedings in the accomplishment of the magnum opus, while the other terms transmutation a great gift of God. These points of resemblance, however, do not necessarily indicate a common authorship, for a general belief in the facts of alchemy was held at that period by many intelligent men, who were well aware, and loud in their condemnation, of the innumerable frauds which disgraced the science. On the other hand, it is plain that the history of C. R. C., as it is contained in the 'Fama,' is not the history, equally fabulous, of that Knight of the Golden Stone, who is the hero of the 'Chymical Marriage.'

"IV. It is obviously easy to exaggerate the philological argument, or rather the argument from the identity of literary style, in the documents under consideration. This point indeed can only be adequately treated by a German. At present it rests on a single assertion of Arnold, which is uncorroborated by any illustrative facts. I think it will also be plain, even to the casual reader, that the 'Chymical Marriage' is a work of 'extraordinary talent,' as Buhle justly observes, but that the 'Fama Fraternitatis' is a work of no particular talent, either inventive or otherwise, while the subsequent 'Confession,' both in matter and manner, is simply beneath contempt. Yet we are required to believe that the first was produced at the age of fifteen, while the worthless pamphlets are the work of the same writer from seven to thirteen years subsequently.

"V. The connection of the 'Universal Reformation' with the other Rosicrucian manifestoes is so uncertain, that if Andreas could be proved its translator, his connection with the society would still be doubtful. The appearance of the 'Fama Fraternalitatis' and the 'Universal Reformation' in one pamphlet no more proves them to have emanated from a single source, than the publication of the 'Confessio' in the same volume as the 'Secretioris Philosophiæ Consideratio' proves Philippus à Gabella to have been the author of that document. The practice of issuing unconnected works within the covers of a single book was common at that period. But the argument which ascribes the 'Universal Reformation' to Andreas is entirely conjectural.

"To dispose of the Andrean claim, a third hypothesis must be briefly considered. If Andreas was a follower of Paracelsus, a believer in alchemy, an aspirant towards the spiritual side of the magnus opus, or an adept therein, he would naturally behold with sorrow and disgust the trickery and imposture with which alchemy was then surrounded, and by which it has been indelibly disgraced, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that he may have attempted to reform the science by means of a secret society, whose manifestoes are directed against those very abuses. But in spite of the statement of Louis Figuier, I can find no warrant in the life or writings of Andreas for supposing that he was a profound student, much less a fanatical partisan of Paracelsus, and it is clear from his 'Turris Babel,' 'Mythologia Christiana,' and other works, that he considered the Rosicrucian manifestoes a reprehensible hoax. In the twenty-fifth chapter of the first of these books, the author proposes to supply the place of the fabulous Rosicrucian Society by his own Christian Fraternity. Indeed, wherever he speaks of it in his known writings, it is either with contempt or condemnation. Nihil cum hac Fraternitate commune habeo, says Truth in the 'Mythologia Christiana.' 'Listen, ye Mortals,' cries Fama in the 'Turris Babel,' 'you need not wait any longer for any brotherhood; the comedy is played out; Fama has put it up, and now destroys it. Fama has said Yes, and now utters No.'

"My readers are now in possession of the facts of the case, and must draw their own conclusions. If in spite of the difficulties which I have impartially stated, Andreas has any claim upon the authorship of the Rosicrucian manifestoes, it must be viewed in a different light. According to Herder, his purpose was to make the secret societies of his time reconsider their position, and to show them how much of their aims and movements was ridiculous, but not to found any society himself. According to Figuier, he really founded the Rosicrucian Society, but ended by entire disapproval of its methods, and therefore started his Christian Fraternity. But the facts of the case are against this hypothesis, for the 'Invitatio Fraternitatis Christi ad Sacri amoris Candidatos' was published as early as 1617, long before the Rosicrucian Order could have degenerated from the principles of its master. It is impossible that Andreas should have projected two associations at the same time."

Our space does not permit us, nor would it be fair, to borrow more from Mr Waite's masterly criticism upon the claims of Andreas. They should be studied in the "Real History of the Rosicrucians." It is plain Johann Valentin Andreas had no faith in the works supposed to be by him, and this is very strong proof against his authorship.

In Chapter II. of the "Confession" we find Bacon's great idea of the "amendment of philosophy," hinted at.

"Concerning the amendment of philosophy, we have (as much as at this present is needful) declared that the same is altogether weak and faulty; nay, whilst many (I know not how) alledge that she is sound and strong, to us it is certain that she fetches her last breath."

And in Chapter IV., this:—

"Now concerning the first part, we hold that the meditations of our Christian father on all subjects which from the creation of the world have been invented, brought forth, and propagated by human ingenuity, through God's revelation, or through the service of Angels or spirits, or through the sagacity of understanding, or through the experience of long observation, are so great, that if all books should perish, and by God's almighty suffrance all writings and all learning should be lost, yet posterity will be able thereby to lay a new foundation of sciences, and to erect a new citadel of truth ; the which perhaps would not be so hard to do as if one should begin to pull down and destroy the old, ruinous building, then enlarge the fore-court, afterwards bring light into the private chambers, and then change the doors, staples, and other things according to our intention."

We see at once that posterity and the sciences are here brought in in a thoroughly Baconian manner. The striking part of these manifestoes, is their identity of aim with Bacon's philosophy and work which meets us everywhere, that is "a new foundation of the sciences," together with a "handing on of the lamps to posterity." We shall presently quote from the "Confession of the Rosicrucian Fraternity" a passage where they speak of one of the greatest impostors of their age—a stage-player, a man with sufficient ingenuity for imposition, whom we believe is meant for Shakespeare.

CHAPTER II.

THE PROPHECY OF PARACELSUS, AND THE UNIVERSAL REFORMATION OF THE WHOLE WIDE WORLD.

“So give Authors their due as you give time his due, which is to discover truth.”—BACON'S ‘Promus,’ 341.

“PARACELSUS, in the eighth chapter of his ‘Treatise on Metals,’ gave utterance to the following prognostication:—Quod utilius Deus pateferi sinet, quod autem majoris momenti est, vulgo adhuc latet usque ad Eliæ Artistæ adventum, quando is venerit. ‘God will permit a discovery of the highest importance to be made, it must be hidden till the advent of the artist Elias.’ In the first chapter of the same work, he says:—Hoc item verum est nihil est absconditum quod non sit relegendum; ideo, post me veniet cujus magnale mundum vivit qui multa revelabit. ‘And it is true, there is nothing concealed that shall not be discovered; for which cause a marvellous being shall come after me, who as yet lives not, and who shall reveal many things.’ These passages have been claimed as referring to the founder of the Rosicrucian order, and as prophecies of this character are usually the outcome of a general desire rather than of an individual inspiration, they are interesting evidence that then as now many thoughtful people were looking for another saviour of society. At the beginning of the seventeenth century ‘a great and general reformation,’ says Buhle—a reformation far more radical and more directed to the moral improvement of mankind than that accomplished by Luther,—‘was believed to be impending over the human race.’¹ Louis Figuier, in his “Alchemy and Alchemists,” thinks that Andreas was filled with a desire to fulfil this prophecy of Paracelsus. And that out of this arose the idea to found the famous Rosicru-

cian Brotherhood. But this in no way answers the problem of the prophecy put forward of the advent of an artist. What sort of artist could this be? How answer to it? It is indeed striking that at a time, when thousands are beginning to believe that Lord Bacon was the author of the plays attributed hitherto to Shakespeare, and to see that these plays are as profound as Nature, and are promising an astounding revelation or rebirth of miraculous character, we should find those strange initials among the chosen brethren of the Rosy Cross set down in the narrative of the discovery of the body of Christian Rosencreutz—

4. F. B. M. P. A., Pictor et Architectus.

At any rate, here is an Artist, whose initials answer to those of Francis Bacon. The letters P. A. seem to be only initials for Pictor et Architectus, and we like to indulge in the theory that M. stands for Magister or Founder—the head of the association. Now in Bacon's "New Atlantis" we find him presenting us with a venerable man who is called the "Tirsan," or father. "The Father of the Family whom they call the Tirsan" (vide passim, "New Atlantis"). This man always addresses the others with the title of sons.

"God bless thee, my son; I will give thee the greatest jewel I have. For I will impart unto thee, for the love of God and men, a relation of the true state of Solomon's House.

"The End of our Foundation is the knowledge of Causes, and secret motions of things; and the enlarging of the bounds of Human Empire, to the effecting of all things possible."

With the last paragraph we see Bacon's philosophy speaking in disguise, as if Bacon was himself the orator.

"And when he had said this, he stood up; and I, as I had been taught, kneeled down; and he laid his right hand upon my head, and said; 'God bless thee, my son, and God bless this relation which I have made.'"

son, though he had no issue at all. Can we not see in this protagonist of the "New Atlantis"—who is Cicerone, and who describes all the discoveries and sciences of the nineteenth century, anticipating them as the result of his inductive and experimental method—Bacon himself? All the descriptions of the marvels of scientific discoveries, Sound Houses, which anticipate the Telephone, Observatories, Zoological and Botanical Gardens, &c., &c., are sheer projections of the genius of Bacon's mind, seeing like Moses from Mount Pisgah, the promised land, which his instrument or organum is to realize. It is an ideal Island placed with true prophetic insight in the west, where new worlds were just discovered,—it is America which is to realize, and has realized some of these prophecies. But we see more. The Ship device, is Bacon's precious Argo bound through the pillars of Hercules to this ideal Utopia in the west of his imagination. This is what he calls "Anticipation of the Mind." The "New Atlantis"¹ is an ideal vision of the New World of intellectual discovery, to which Bacon's emblematic ship is sailing through the pillars of Hercules,² and which he foresaw would be America. If Columbus discovered the New World, Bacon discovers an intellectual New World of wonders—the result of his inductive method, and every description in the "Atlantis" of the scientific wonders therein described are efforts (and in most cases marvellous successes) to realize the future. For he repeatedly tells us that there will be much going to and fro,³ that light will come to men, that mankind would master and conquer Nature—making her his slave.

² The sciences seem to have their Hercules' pillars, which bound the desires and hopes of mankind. (Gt. Instauration, Pref.)

³ "Nor should the prophecy of Daniel be forgotten, touching the last

We take the following from the “Confession of the Rosicrucian Fraternity,” published 1615 :—

“For conclusion of our Confession we must earnestly admonish you, that you cast away, if not all, yet most of the worthless books of pseudo chymists, to whom it is a jest to apply the Most Holy Trinity to vain things, or to deceive men with monstrous symbols and enigmas, or to profit by the curiosity of the credulous ; our age doth produce many such, one of the greatest being a STAGE-PLAYER, a man with sufficient ingenuity for imposition.” (Chapter XII., “Hist. Rosicrucians.”)

We know that Shakespeare, who died 1616, was a stage-player as well as a manager and supposed author of the plays. If Bacon was a Rosicrucian, we may depend upon it that the real secret of the authorship was well known to many members of the brotherhood, as we have sufficient reason to see in the case of Ben Jonson.

Mr Waite writes (page 35, “Real History of the Rosicrucians”) :—

“Somewhere about the year 1614 a pamphlet was published anonymously in German, called ‘Die Reformation der Ganzen Weiten Welt,’ which, according to De Quincey, contained a distinct proposition to inaugurate a secret society, having for its object the general welfare of mankind. This description is simply untrue ; the ‘Universal Reformation’ is an amusing and satirical account of an abortive attempt made by the god Apollo to derive assistance towards the improvement of the age from the wise men of antiquity and modern times. It is a fairly literal translation of Advertisement 77 of Boccacini’s ‘Ragguagli di Parnasso, Centuria Prima,’ its internal connection with Rosi-ages of the world :—“Many shall go to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased ;” clearly intimating that the thorough passage of the world (which now by so many distant voyages seems to be accomplished, or in course of accomplishment), and the advancement of the sciences, are destined by fate, that is, by Divine Providence, to meet in the same age.

crucianism is not clear, but it has been generally reprinted with the society's manifestos, alchemical interpretations have been placed on it, and it is cited by various authors as the first publication of the Fraternity."

The reader is begged to mark that it is the god Apollo who makes this movement for the improvement and reformation of the entire world. Now we find Lord Bacon figuring in George Withers' "Great Assizes, held at Parnassus," as President representing the god Apollo, and presiding over all the learning of his age. Note, these assizes are held at Parnassus, with which compare Boccalini's title, "Ragguagli di Parnasso." Throughout Boccalini's work, Apollo is presented as protagonist. The connection of the 77th Advertisement of Boccalini's "Ragguagli di Parnasso" with the Society may be not yet clear, but the very fact that it is found in the Brotherhood's manifestoes, and that it is cited as the first publication of the Rosicrucians, is in itself the strongest possible evidence in favour of relationship. The subject-matter speaks for itself, being thoroughly in harmony with the Reformation. Apollo summons the seven wise men of Greece to make an inquiry as to the state of society. They severally deliver separate remedies for the diseases of the age. But the age is found too rotten and corrupt for cura. Here is the graphic description of the state of the age:—

"At these words the philosophers stript him in a trice, and found that this miserable wretch was covered all over four inches thick with a scurf of appearances. They caused ten razors to be forthwith brought unto them, and fell to shaving it off with great diligence, but they found it so far eaten into his very bones that in all the huge colossus there was not one inch of good live flesh, at which, being struck with horror and despair, they put on the patient's cloaths again, and dismiss him. Then, convinced that the disease was incurable, they shut themselves up together, and abandoning the case of publike affairs, they resolved to provide for the safety of their own reputations." ("Universal Reformation.")

In this passage we see as it were, an explanation of the rise and origin of the society. The age is beyond any sort of radical cure ; and the Literati of Apollo must provide for the safety of their own reputations. Here we have a hint of the danger accompanying any attempt at an open Reformation. In such an age, only one possible way lay clear, and that was just what we find was aimed at by this society of Rosicrucians. That was, to form a secret Literary Brotherhood, embracing the highest intellects and the purest hearts in all Europe. We see that it was simultaneously put forward, as a general movement throughout Europe from several different centres or countries. Bocalini was a Venetian, Andreas was a native of Wirtemberg ; and we read of Lord Bacon presiding at the "Great Assizes held by Apollo and his Assessours at Parnassus." How is it we find a follower of the law, like Lord Bacon, representing Apollo, and presiding over, not only the learning of the age, but the poetry of the age also ? How is it Shakespeare, whose name figures amongst the Assessours, is not in his proper place as Apollo ? Did he not prefix to the "first heir of his invention," Venus and Adonis, these lines, which seem so appropriate for an Apollo of art ?—

"Vilia miretur vulgus ; mihi flavus Apollo Pocula Castalia plena ministret aqua."

Castalia, as everybody knows (and as Shakespeare learnt at the Stratford Grammar School), takes us to the foot of Mount Parnassus, to the Temple of Apollo—to the famous Spring, to the home of the Muses. We find in the Winter's Tale, the Temple and Oracle of Apollo at Delphi introduced. Delphi was supposed to be exactly in the middle of the earth, and therefore called umbilicus orbis terrarum. But how is it we say that Shakespeare, who commences his poetic career with a Latin quotation, which plainly indicates his intention to drink at the Castalian Spring, at the pure fount of the Golden Apollo itself, does not preside over the Great Assizes held by Apollo and his Assessours at Parnassus ? Why permit himself to derogate to an insignificant position, low down on the list, with Ben Jonson, Davenant, Drayton, and others? One thing must, so far, be plain to the impartial critic,—that is, there is a remarkable double connection to be traced between Boccalini's Advertisement 77 (out of the "Ragguagli di Parnasso") and the "Universal Reformation," which reproduces it literally as a Rosicrucian manifesto. On the other hand, there is a likeness in the "Great Assizes held by Apollo and his Assessours at Parnassus" to Boccalini's title, which is remarkable. Boccalini's work furnishes word for word the "Universal Reformation," with its story of Apollo and the seven Sages of Greece, as applied to the age.

The title of the "Fama" ran—"A Universal Reformation of the Whole Wide World, by order of the God Apollo, is published by the Seven Sages of Greece." Thales gives his opinion:—"The true and immediate cure, then, for these present evils consists in necessitating men to live with candour of mind and purity of heart, which cannot be better effected then by making that little window in men's breasts which his Majesty hath often promised to his most faithful virtuosi; for when those who use such art in their proceedings shall be forced to speak and act, having a window whereby one may see into their hearts, they will learn the excellent virtue of being, and not appearing to be; they will conform deeds to words, and their tongues to sincerity of heart; all men will banish lies and falsehood, and the diabolical spirit of hypocrisy will abandon many who are now possest with so foul a fiend."

This idea is repeated in the following sonnet:—

XXIV.

" Mine eye hath play'd the painter and hath stell'd
 Thy beauty's form in table of my heart;
 My body is the frame wherein 'tis held,
 And perspective it is best painter's art.
 For through the painter must you see his skill,
 To find where your true image pictured lies;
 Which in my bosom's shop is hanging still,
 That hath his windows glazed with thine eyes.

Now see what good turns eyes for eyes have done :
 Mine eyes have drawn thy shape, and thine for me
Are windows to my breast, where-through the sun
 Delights to peep, to gaze therein on thee ;
 Yet eyes this cunning want to grace their art ;
 They draw but what they see, know not the heart."

Then Solon thus began :—" In my opinion, gentlemen, that which hath put the present age into so great confusion is the cruel hatred and spiteful envy which is seen to reign generally amongst men. All hope then for these present evils is from the infusion of charity, reciprocal affection, and that sanctified love of our neighbour which is God's chiefest commandment to mankind."

We thus see that the work of Boccacini, of which this is only the seventy-seventh Advertisement, is a book dealing with the diseases of the society of its time. Boccacini was a Venetian. It appears that these works, like the "Fama" in Germany and Boccacini's in Italy, appeared somewhat contemporaneously, as if the result of an organised movement. Anthony Bacon, the devoted brother of Francis Bacon, lived a great number of years abroad, and some time at Venice. The two brothers seem always to have been in active correspondence.

Anthony Bacon was lame, and it is possible that he is alluded to in the Sonnets, where we have the line—

"Speak of my lameness and I straight will halt."
 —Sonnets, 37, 39.

We find also in the Sonnets the poet saying, "both your poets," as if there were two.

Here is the list of "the Great Assizes holden by Apollo and his Assessours at Parnassus."

This was written by George Withers, and whether an account of what he remembered, or heard, or invented, it is impossible to say. Withers was a poet, and the position he assigns Shakespeare and Bacon respectively is evidence of his value of Shakespeare.

Nicolai, the friend of Lessing, and the editor of "Moses Mendelssohn," claimed Lord Bacon as the founder of Free Masonry. Nicolai had a theory of his own, and sought to derive everything from the Rosicrucians. In the year 1646 the celebrated philosopher, Elias Ashmole, who founded the museum at Oxford, was initiated in a Lodge at Warrington, as he has himself recorded in his diary. Now we are going to quote from Oliver's "Discrepancies of Freemasonry," about this meeting at Warrington, wherein we shall see Nicolai giving his opinion—a most valuable one—that the persons who met were Rosicrucians.

"Do any of you know that the Ashmolean Masonry is altogether ignored on the continent of Europe?' the Surgeon inquired.

"Bro. Frederick Nicolai has given it a decided contradiction,' the Skipper replied. 'He says that the object of the meeting at Warrington, so far from being Masonic, was simply for the purpose of carrying out a philosophical idea which had been promulgated by Lord Bacon in his 'New Atlantis' of the model of a perfect society, instituted for the secret purpose of interpreting nature, and of producing new arts and marvellous inventions for the benefit of mankind, under the name of Solomon's House, or the College of the Six Days' Work, which, in plain language, was intended to be an ideal society for the study of natural philosophy. *The persons present at these meetings are said by Nicolai to have been Rosicrucians,*¹ and we know this to be true of Ashmole himself. He asserts, further, that these men erected, in their Lodge, two Great Pillars, which they called the Pillars of Hermes, in front of Solomon's House, and they used a chequered pavement, a ladder of seven staves or rounds, and many other secret symbols. And as they held their subsequent meetings in Mason's Hall, London, they adopted the tools of working masons; and this, he says conclusively, was the origin of Symbolical Masonry. And as it was invented about the time of the Restoration, the judicial murder of Charles the First was introduced as an incidental legend.'" (Page 78).

Everybody acquainted with Bacon's works must call to mind the two pillars, between which his device of a ship is passing, or the other of the globe of the intellectual world, flanked by the two columns. But the "New Atlantis" of Bacon proves that he belonged to some secret or Masonic Society, inasmuch as the College of the Six Days (or creation) and Solomon's Temple, speak loudly enough for themselves. How is it we find in 1646, a few years after Bacon's death, a party of persons meeting in a Lodge to carry out the ideas promulgated in the "New Atlantis"?

This shows the enormous secret influence Bacon exercised over the minds of men. And we cannot lightly wave aside the opinion of such a man as Nicolai, that these persons were Rosicrucians. It is easy for people to make the assertion that Masonry and Rosicrucianism were separate and distinct, as has been said. They may have become so afterwards, but there is strong evidence to show that about Bacon's time, that is, the early part of the 17th and end of the 16th century, Rosicrucianism made a great sensation and noise in Europe, promising and setting forth an universal scheme for the reformation of society, in just such fashion as Bacon puts forth in his "New Atlantis." The Rosicrucians called themselves Invisibles. They said that God covered them with a cloud in order to shelter them from their enemies. This idea of the cloud we find Bacon repeating:—"As to the heathen antiquities of the world, it is in vain to note them for deficient: deficient they are no doubt, consisting mostly of fables and fragments, but the deficiency cannot be holpen; for antiquity is like fame, caput inter nublla condit, her head is muffled from our sight." Now this is a remarkable passage—for first Bacon denies the deficiency of the heathen antiquities, then cautiously compromises, for fear of saying too much, and finally takes refuge in a simile, which shows the estimation that he held, and how he fully appreciated, the heights of the peaks of antiquity, which he identifies with fame,—too lofty for common sight or comprehension. There is something in these words and the comparison of the heathen antiquities with Fame (hidden in a cloud), that recalls the "Fama Fraternitatis" of the meritorious order of the Rosy Cross. It is just these heathen antiquities and Pagan rites, which it was the aim of the Rosicrucians and Free Masons to shelter, preserve, and hand on as lamps for posterity. Take up any of the thousand books on Freemasonry, and they take one back at once in their histories to the Mysteries—and particularly Virgils. Here is what a masonic writer writes upon the purpose and object of Freemasonry:—

“In concluding my work, I repeat that the freemasons’ society was founded for the purpose of concealing the rites of the ancient pagan religion, under the cover of operative masonry; and that, although the religion is extinct, its ceremonials remain, and clearly develop the origin of the institution.”

Between 1613 and 1630 there was an enormous amount of literature published in Europe about the Rosicrucians. This period coincides with the best and ripest years of Bacon’s life—including the last thirteen years, during the latter part of which (the final five years) he lived in continual retirement, study, and correspondence, which, in itself, is curious enough.¹ It is striking that the period of the rise and decline of Rosicrucianism in Europe, exactly coincides with Bacon’s life! Four years after his death in 1630, the Rosicrucian literature is already upon the decline. In Rawley’s “Life of Bacon” we find he had correspondence with foreigners, and that he possessed an extraordinary power of raising admiration in others. That this was due only to his Inductive Philosophy, or prose works, is quite inconceivable. Even the learned King James declared of Bacon’s work, the “Novum Organum,” that “It was like the peace of God—it passed all understanding.” We know that Coke ridiculed his ship device, as a “Ship of Fools,”—that Hervey declared he wrote “philosophy like a Lord Chancellor,” so that the idea that his system was understood or appreciated at its full value by his own age is quite erroneous. What, then, was the secret of his intimacy and attraction for foreign worthies? Rawley relates that many came from a great distance merely from curiosity to see him.

“Amongst the rest, Marquis Fiat, a French nobleman, who came ambassador into England, in the beginning of Queen Mary, wife to King Charles, was taken with an extraordinary desire of seeing him; for which he made way by a friend; and when he came to him, being then through weakness confined to his bed, the marquis saluted him with this high expression, 'That his lordship had been ever to him like the angels, of whom he had often heard, and read much of them in books, but he never saw them.' After which they contracted an intimate acquaintance, and the marquis did so much revere him, that besides his frequent visits, they wrote letters one to the other, under the titles and appellations of father and son.¹ As for his many salutations by letters from foreign worthies devoted to learning, I forbear to mention them, because that is a thing common to other men of learning or note, together with him." ("Life," p. 12.)

If Bacon were the promoter or head of some great secret society like the Rosicrucians, anxious to promote the welfare of mankind and reform society, we can quite understand this influence, and it is only this sort of influence which could work upon men in those ages from afar, and be likely to provoke such words as are quoted in italics above. But what greater proof can we have than the "New Atlantis," with its Solomon, and Temple, its College of Creation or the Six Days, and its entire aim and object?

We find the Rosicrucians putting in a decided appearance as an association about 1600. A writer ("Mysteries of Antiquity") says:—"We see from the account of the Society of Christian Rosy Cross, that it claims to date from about the year 1490, but we do not read of the association under that name prior to 1600, and the impossibility of the narrative, points out to us that the name of the founder is mythical, and that its allegory is derived from the symbols of the order itself, which is no doubt of antiquity." The date of that extraordinary work, Chester's "Love's Martyr," is 1601. "At the supposed revival of Rosicrucianism at Paris, in March 1623, the Order was said to number thirty-six members." The date that the collected form of the so-called Shakespearian plays, appear for the first time (as the first folio edition, 1623), is the same date as this revival of Rosicrucianism at Paris. Yarker writes ("Mysteries of Antiquity") :— "Most of their symbols resemble those used in our Masonic degrees, especially the Arch, and Rosæ Crucis, and they trace their doctrines through the same channel as modern Freemasons, and assert the derivation of their mysteries through Enoch, the Patriarchs, and Moses to Solomon." With Solomon we find ourselves in mysterious touch again with Bacon, who is never weary of quoting him, and who introduces him ever thus :— "The glory of God is to conceal a thing, but the glory of the King is to find it out, as if according to the innocent play of children, the Divine Majesty took delight to hide his works, to the end to have them found out." (Passim, "Works.")

To those who maintain there is no mystery, no reserve, and no implied privacy of publication hinted at, or suggested by Bacon in his works, we present the following passage for study and reflection. It is not this single passage, but many others to the same effect that might be quoted.

"Now for my plan of publication, it is this. Those parts of the work which have it for their object to find out, and bring into correspondence, such minds as are prepared and disposed for the argument, and to purge the floors of men's understandings,— I wish to be published to the world and circulate from mouth to mouth ; the rest I would have passed from hand to hand with selection and judgment. Not but that I know it is an old trick of impostors to keep a few of their follies back from the public which are indeed no better than those which they put forward ; but in this case it is no imposture at all, but a sound foresight, which tells me that the formula itself of Interpretation, and the discoveries made by the same, will thrive better if committed to the charge of some fit and selected minds, and kept private."

Elsewhere he talks of an oral method of transmission, which reminds us at once of Masonry. But whatever may be objected to our arguments, one thing is plain—(that is), Bacon speaks of two methods belonging to his philosophic system. One is his Inductive Philosophy—the other Anticipation of the Mind, of which we have a hint in the prophetic scientific discoveries of his “New Atlantis.”

In the “Advancement of Learning,” Bacon writes :—

“Another diversity of method there is,” [he is speaking of the different methods of communicating and transmitting knowledge] which hath some affinity with the former, used in some cases by the discretion of the ancients, but disgraced since by the impostures of many vain persons, who have made it as a false light for their counterfeit merchandises ; and that is, enigmatical and disclosed. The pretence whereof [that is, of the enigmatical method] is to remove the vulgar capacities from being admitted to the secrets of knowledges, and to reserve them to selected auditors, or wits of such sharpness as can pierce the veil.”

We here find Bacon alluding to the ancients and their “enigmatical and disclosed”—(that is, open and secret)—methods of writing—methods which have been disgraced by bastard or false art, which shows us, not only that he understood what “counterfeit merchandise” meant, but that he understood the ancients and their secret doctrines sufficiently well to make these comparisons and observations. Of course, Bacon is alluding to such art as, for example, Virgil’s VIth Book, which Warburton (in his “Divine Legation”) was the first to show was “enigmatical and disclosed”—i.e., “The Mysteries,” and nothing else. Mark how Bacon is down upon false art, which we find paralleled in Sonnet 68 :—

“And him as for a map doth Nature store
To show false art what beauty was of yore.”

“In him those holy antique hours are seen,
Without all ornament itself and true.”

This thoroughly falls in with Bacon's declaration that he is going "usque ad aras" with the ancients, or "I going the same road as the ancients," all of which antiquity can be refound in the Winter's Tale, Tempest, and Midsummer Night's Dream.

But since Bacon declares that if all sciences were lost "they might be found in Virgil," it may be as well to make further inquiry into this matter :—

"But the universe to the eye of the human understanding is framed like a labyrinth ; presenting as it does on every side so many ambiguities of way, such deceitful resemblances of objects and signs, natures so irregular in their lines, and so knotted and entangled. And then the way is still to be made by the uncertain light of the sense, sometimes shining out, sometimes clouded over, through the woods of experience and particulars ; while those who offer themselves for guides are (as was said) themselves also puzzled, and increase the number of errors and wanderers." (Preface, "Magna Instauration.")

Compare :—

"Quale per incertam lunam, sub luce malignâ,
Est iter in sylvis ; ubi cœlum Jupiter umbrâ Condidit et rebus nox abstulit atra colorem."

—Virgil's "Æneid," VIth Book.

Bacon goes on :—

"For my own part at least, in obedience to the everlasting love of truth, I have committed myself to the uncertainties and difficulties and solitudes of the ways, and relying on the divine assistance have upheld my mind both against the shocks and embattled ranks of opinion, and against my own private and inward hesitations and scruples, and against the fogs and clouds of nature, and the phantoms flitting about on every side."

And then follows, fortunately for us, else the critic would say we imagine these things :—

"This likewise I humbly pray, that things human may not interfere with things divine, and that from the opening of the ways of sense and the increase of natural light there may arise in our minds no incredulity or darkness with regard to the divine mysteries; but rather that the understanding being thereby purified and purged of fancies and vanity, and yet not the less subject and entirely submissive to the divine oracles, may give to faith that which is faith's."

All these passages are extracts, in sequence, following each other closely, and so connected in imagery and style, as to leave the subject-matter and source unmistakable. To those who recognise in The Tempest and Dream, the art of Virgil's Vth Book of the "Æneid," or the "Mysteries," this will speak volumes.

Bacon writes:—

"For the end which this science of mine proposes is the invention not of arguments but of arts; not of things in accordance with principles, but of principles themselves; not of probable reasons, but of designations and directions for works. And as the intention is different, so accordingly is the effect; the effect of the one being to overcome an opponent in argument, of the other to command nature in action."

Nature in action is a suspicious term, which suggests plays. Why does Bacon speak of arts? In another place, he says, "Life is short and art long."¹

But what indeed is important in this declaration:—

"For if I should profess that I, going the same road as the ancients, have something better to produce, there must needs have been some comparison or rivalry between us (not to be avoided by any art of words), in respect of excellency or ability of wit; and though in this there would be nothing unlawful or new, yet the contest, however just and allowable, would have been an unequal one perhaps, in respect of the measure of my own powers."

This is so startling as almost to take our breath away, and we must remain lost in bewilderment. Here is the secret of the Great Restoration. For is this the way Bacon is going, viz., to return the road of antiquity, and beat Æschylus, Euripides, Sophocles, at their own art, around their own altars, usque ad aras?

“And to make my meaning clearer and to familiarise the thing by giving it a name, I have chosen to call one of these methods or ways, Anticipation of the Mind, the other, Interpretation of Nature.”

Now, we ask the world to tell us, where is the other method which Bacon entitles so beautifully, Anticipation of the Mind?

CHAPTER III.

THE TEMPEST;

OR,

ONE OF BACON'S ANTICIPATIONS.

“What impossible matter will he make easy next?”

—Tempest.

It will be generally granted that in the play of The Tempest we have a magical, superhuman presentation of the Poet, as Creator, who, as it were, opens the heavens of his art, and discloses himself upon his enchanted island, whence his soul and spirit, from the calm and security of his retreat, watches the tempest which he has himself raised. It is a sort of invisible place or Hades, as well as a Heaven, for though we see it plainly enough with the letter of the text, we are not sufficiently initiated as yet into this art to behold it with the mind's eye as epopts or seers. We are puzzled—dreadfully perplexed as to the bearing of this island, and rightly, for if we could only locate it, we might find Prospero also. Before, therefore, we can thoroughly enjoy the full signification of the masque or vision, and enter into the spirit of the show, we must be initiated. Prospero has always been associated with the Poet-Creator himself, and seeing that the play stands first in the Folio Edition of 1623, it is not unreasonable to suppose that it is a presentation of the Artist in relation to his own art. As such we propose to study it. Whatever matured views the author had when he laid down his pen and broke his rod, should be found here, for it is the last of the plays—the last which stand first in the folio, which is a significant fact. After completing our work, we write our preface or introduction, and place it in front, or at the commencement of our book. Even so it may be fairly supposed that there is a like relationship obtaining between The Tempest, as introductory or summary, in relationship to the entire cycle of this marvellous art. The picture presented by Prospero bears out this theory. It is that of a god in art. We, therefore, propose to give reasons for believing that this play deals with a purely spiritual side of the plays, as a representative symbolical portrait of itself. First, we will examine the background, or setting, of the play, first taking the enchanted island as a starting-point, and so on to other matters.

Islands of Souls or Spirits.

Islands are constantly found connected with enchantment, magic, or the ideal, as Utopias, islands of the Blessed, Elysian Fields, or Heavens. We find this to be the case directly we recall Homer's Ogygia, the island of Calypso, St Brandons, the (New) Atlantis of Plato, and Bacon. We have the Elysium of Homer, the Fortunate Isles of Pindar, and the garden of the Hesperides. Among islands of Heaven, or Paradise, is the island of Venus in the ninth book of the "Lusiad." Then there are several parallel Edens, as the garden of Alcinous in the "Odyssey" (bk. vii.); the island of Circe, "Odyssey" (x.); the Elysium of Virgil ("Æneid," vi.); the island or palace of vice in "Orlando Furioso" (vi. vii.); the island of Armida in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered;" and so on. Lambertus Floridus describes Paradise as "Paradisus insula in oceano in oriente." Then we have Avalon, or the "Isle of Apples," a name which Mr Baring Gould ("Curious Myths of the Middle Ages") remarks, "reminds one of the gardens of the Hesperides." This fair Avalon is the "Island of the Blessed of the Kelts." This is the land to which King Arthur's body was borne,

"Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever winds blow loudly; but lies
Deep-meadow'd happy fair with orchard lawns,
And bowery hollows crown'd with summer sea."

"In the Portuguese legend, the island of the Seven Cities is unquestionably the land of departed Spirits of the ancient Keltiberians," writes Mr Gould ("Curious Myths of the Middle Ages"). We find almost always these islands connected with the other world—sometimes as places of punishment, sometimes, and more often, as Elysiums or Heavens. Sometimes these islands are to be found called the Land of Souls, or the Departed; but whatever may be the name given to them, they are always found to be connected with Death. Therefore, no fitter emblem of the next world, or of the Spiritual World, can be found than a lone, unknown island like Prospero's, placed, we know not where, amid the untracked ocean of his art. It is also curious that we find the idea of these islands connected with Revelation—that is, with the hereafter, as abodes of Truth and Light. But we must quote, in order to support our assertions; which we will only do to an extent not prejudicial to our space. The reader is earnestly referred to the interesting chapters upon this subject in the work already quoted, where he will find abundance of evidence.

In classical mythology and poetry we find, again, a frequent mention of the Islands of the Blessed, as the abode of souls. Thus Pindar: "The lawless souls of those who die here forthwith suffer punishment: and some one beneath the earth, pronouncing sentence by stern necessity, judges the sinful deeds, done in this realm of Zeus; but the good enjoy the sun's light both by day and by night—while those who, through a threefold existence in the upper and lower worlds, have kept their souls pure from all sin, ascend the path of Zeus to the castle of Chronus, where ocean breezes blow round the Islands of the Blessed, and golden flowers glitter."

We thus see that these islands were spiritual islands, or heavens. Olympiodorus (MSS. Commentary on the "Gorgias" of Plato) speaks of the Fortunate Islands raised above the sea,—the Islands of the Blessed,—of the emancipated Soul—that is, of Truth and Light. Now, what we have to propose is this. Is it not possible—nay, probable, that the island of Prospero is such an island in relation to the rest of his art—an island of his emancipated soul,—emancipated from his work—the Heaven of his creative power, a picture of the Spiritual and its origin, in relation to the Truth and Light? With the completion of The Tempest the plays cease to appear. His rough magic is abjured. And in the play we have the significant and striking symbol of the breaking of his wand,—as a sign that his magic is at an end. If Prospero by common consent has always been considered an emblem, or portrait of the poet-author himself, have we not right on our side when we postulate a symbolical interpretation to the entire play? It is no reason because we see just this resemblance of Prospero (as magician, and God) to the poet-creator or maker (and no more), that the resemblance really terminates here!

Mr Baring Gould relates the following beautiful legend in his "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages":—"In former days there lived in Skerr a Druid of renown. He sat with his face to the west on the shore, his eye following the declining sun. As he sat musing on a rock, a storm arose on the sea; a cloud, under whose squally skirts the foaming waters tossed, rushed suddenly into the bay, and from its dark womb emerged a ship or boat with white sails bent to the wind, and banks of gleaming oars on either side. But it was destitute of Mariners, itself seeming to live and move. An unusual terror seized on the aged Druid; he heard a voice call 'Arise, and see the Green Isle of those who have passed away!' Then he entered the vessel. Immediately the wind shifted, the cloud enveloped him, and in the bosom of the vapour he sailed away. Seven days gleamed on him through the mist; on the eighth the waves rolled violently, the vessel pitched, and darkness thickened around him, when suddenly he heard a cry, 'The Isle! The Isle.' Before his eyes lay the Isle of the Departed." (Fortunate Isles, Curious Myths, 553).

Here we have a picture of an Island of Souls—of the Departed, and it is interesting to see that in this legend we have a Ship, and evidences of a tempest or storm raging around the Island, on its approach. "It is curious to note how retentive of ancient mythologic doctrines relative to death are the memories of the peoples. This Keltic fable of the 'Land beyond the Sea' to which souls are borne after death, has engrafted itself on popular religion in England."

" Shall we meet in that blest harbour
When our stormy voyage is o'er ?
Shall we meet and cast the anchor
By the fair celestial shore ? "

—Curious Myths.

Thomas Taylor writes in his "Eleusinian and Bacchic Mysteries":—"Let us proceed to consider the description which Virgil gives us of these fortunate abodes, and the latent signification which it contains. Æneas and his guide, then, having passed through Hades, and seen at a distance Tartarus, or the utmost profundity of a material nature, they next advance to the Elysian fields:—

" Devenere locus lætos, et amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum, sedesque beatas.
Largior hic campos æther et lumine vestit
Purpureo ; solemque suum, sua sidera norunt."

" "They came to the blissful regions, and delightful green retreats, and happy abodes in the fortunate groves. A freer and purer sky here clothes the fields with a purple light ; they recognise their own sun, their own stars."

"Now the secret meaning of these joyful places is thus beautifully unfolded by Olympiodorus in his manuscript Commentary on the 'Gorgias' of Plato. It is necessary to know," says he, "that the Fortunate Islands are said to be raised above the sea ; and hence a condition of being, which transcends this corporeal life and generated existence, is denominated the islands of the blessed ; but these are the same with the elysian fields." What we are suggesting, is that the enchanted island of Prospero is consciously intended to represent such a Fortunate Island raised above the sea, and that the entire play bears evidence of being in touch with Virgil's description of Heaven and Hell in the VIth Book of the "Æneid." Nay, more than this. Have we not in the introduction of the masque a proof that this play, in presenting us with Ceres, and the Idealism connected with her worship (summed up in the magnificent words of Prospero), is really presenting us with an altered parable of the Mysteries—altered to apply to the entire cycle of this art, where the poet-author is the Hierophant, and we the initiates, through Time, of his Divine shows ?

We are now going to present the reader with a very curious hint which we profess to have discovered in the play of The Tempest, identifying it with the Avalon of King Arthur. But, very strangely, Mr Baring Gould identifies Avalon with the Atlantis of Plato, which at once brings us into touch with Lord Bacon's New Atlantis. Seeing that the question of the day is who wrote the plays, and that Bacon is the supposed author, to which we have long been a convert, this is sufficiently interesting in itself. But first let us examine the name of Avalon.

Avalon.

This is what we can gather of the name. "Avalon—an ocean island where King Arthur was buried. The word means 'APPLE GREEN ISLAND,' from aval—apple; and yn—island. It has generally been thought to be Glastonbury, a name derived from the Saxon glastri, which means 'green like grass.'" Mr Baring Gould, as we shall further on see, denies this connection with Glastonbury, but we shall also see he adheres to the name of "Grass Green Island of Apples," which is the important point for our evidence. Before we proceed to quote his learned authority as to the real origin and identification of Avalon, which will be found more curious still, let us bring in the passage from The Tempest in proof:—

- "Adr. Though this island seem to be desert,— Seb. Ha, ha, ha! So, you're paid.
Adr. Uninhabitable and almost inaccessible,—
Seb. Yet,—
Adr. Yet,—
Ant. He could not miss 't.
Adr. It must needs be of subtle, tender, and delicate temperance.
Ant. Temperance was a delicate wench.
Seb. Ay, and a subtle; as he most learnedly delivered.
Adr. The air breathes upon us here most sweetly.
Seb. As if it had lungs and rotten ones.
Ant. Or as 'twere perfumed by a fen.

Gon. Here is every thing advantageous to life.

Ant. True; save means to live.

Seb. Of that there's none, or little.

Gon. How lush and lusty the grass looks! how green!

Ant. The ground indeed is tawny.

Seb. With an eye of green in't.

Ant. He misses not much.

Seb. No; he doth but mistake the truth totally."

We have placed the lines in italics that we wish to be noticed. Mark, it is Gonzalo who declares there is life on the island, while the others disbelieve, and see no signs of life. Whilst he sees signs of life everywhere on this island of art, the others see none. How they mock him—even as the critics will scoff at us!

"Ant. His word is more than the miraculous harp.

Seb. He hath rais'd the wall and houses too.

Ant. What impossible matter will he make easy next?

Seb. I think he will carry this island home in his pocket, AND GIVE IT HIS SON FOR AN APPLE.

Ant. And sowing the kernels of it in the sea, bring forth more islands.

Gon. Ay."

Now, here are two coincidences—viz., that this island is compared to an apple, and that Gonzalo sees "green grass," or signs of life upon it, the others see none! They only see death, but he (Gonzalo) sees life. We have already shown that Avalon derives its name from Apple (aval), or from Glastri, which means "green like grass." Moreover, mark that Gonzalo, who is the sport and target of the sceptics (or his disbelieving critics), not only says "Ay" to the seeming impossibility, but is otherwise right, when he declares Tunis to be Carthage! The others do not believe that even! Their scepticism is of the nature of the nineteenth century scepticism—they are agnostics—they believe nothing. We said just now that Gonzalo's critics only saw death upon the island. Read the passage quoted, and it will be seen that they find the island a hopeless sort of place, and the air as if it came from rotten lungs. Adrian and Gonzalo are full of faith, hope, enthusiasm, but the others ridicule them. At first we feel inclined to laugh at the apparent extravagances of Gonzalo. But we received a rude check when we find that he knows more than his critics, in identifying Tunis with Carthage.

“Ad. Widow Dido said you? You make me study of that; she was of Carthage, not of Tunis.

Gon. This Tunis, Sir, was Carthage.

Ad. Carthage?

Gon. I assure you, Carthage.

Ant. His word is more than the miraculous harp.”

So that we find Gonzalo, though apparently a visionary, is a man of learning, who knows more than his critics were ever taught. And we have a deep suspicion that the poet is laughing at us, and that the impossible and improbable is the real and true in this art, and that when we smile with Sebastian, we are identifying ourselves with his ignorance. If Gonzalo is right upon the question of Tunis and Carthage, why not upon the other points he maintains? Why should not this island be the Green Grass island of Apples—Avalon? But this is a very serious and profound subject, and we must seek assistance elsewhere. Let us again summon Mr Baring Gould to our aid:—

Avalon and Atlantis identical.

“The ancients had a floating tradition relative to a vast continent called Atlantis in the far west, where lay Kronos asleep, guarded by Briareus; a land of rivers and woods and soft airs. Columbus declared that the Theologians and Philosophers were right when they fixed the site of the terrestrial Paradise in the extreme orient, because it is a most temperate climate”¹ (Navarette “Coll de documents,” i. p. 244). “Tzetze and Procopius attempt to localize it (Avalon), and suppose that the land of souls is Britain, but in this they are mistaken; as also are those who think to find Avalon at Glastonbury. Avalon is the Isle of Apples,—a name reminding one of the Garden of the Hesperides in the far western seas, with its tree of golden apples in the midst. When we are told that in the remote Ogygia sleeps Kronos gently watched by Briareus till the time come for his awakening, we have a Græcized form of the myth of Arthur in Avalon being cured of his grievous wound. The Ogygia, says Plutarch, lies due west beneath the setting sun. It need hardly be said that the Arthur of Romance is actually a demi-god—believed in long before the birth of the historic Arthur. According to an ancient poem published by Mons. Villemarque, it is a place of enchanting beauty. There youths and maidens dance hand in hand on the dewy grass, green trees are laden with Apples. There all is plenty, and the golden age¹ ever lasts; cows give their milk that they fill large ponds at milking. There too is a palace all of glass, floating in air, and receiving within its transparent walls the souls of the blessed: it is to this house of glass that Merdin Emrys sings and his nine bards voyage.” (Davies’ “Mythology of the Druids,” p. 522.) We thus see that Mr Baring Gould identifies Avalon with the Ogygia mentioned by Plutarch, and he proceeds to identify this with the Atlantis also. “Ogygia, according to Plutarch, is five days’ sail to the west of Brititia (Great Britain), and, he adds, the great continent or terra firma is five thousand stadia from Ogygia. This is an observation made also by Theopompus in his ‘Geographical Myth of Mesopis.’” (Ælian Var. Hist., iii. 18.) A manuscript in the British Museum tells us that “Paradise hangeth between Heaven and earth wonderfully. There is neither hollow nor hill; nor is there frost nor snow, hail nor rain; but there is fons vite, that is the well of life. Therein dwelleth a beautiful bird called Phoenix; he is large and grand, as the Mighty One formed him; he is the lord over all birds.” (MS. Cotton. Vespas. D. xiv., fol. 163.)

Compare (Sc. iii. Act 3):—

“Seb. Now I will believe,
That there are unicorns: that in Arabia
There is one tree, the phoenix throne: one phoenix
At this hour reigning there.”

is to connect this "Island of Apples" with the New Atlantis of Bacon, which is also a visionary Utopia, where impossible ideals are realised. What we do see by the accounts of Plutarch and Theopompus is, that this Ogygia or Avalon, was placed in the Atlantic Ocean, midway between Brittia and the mainland, America situated beyond. And this is exactly the position the Atlantis of Plato occupied. The Atlantic Island, as described by Marcellus, is as follows. We see here that these islands were sacred to Persephone and to Ammon or Jupiter. We wish this to be marked, because Miranda asleep under the power of her father's spell, suggests Persephone sleeping with Time (Kronos) until the hour comes for her awakening.

"That such and so great an island formerly existed is recorded by some of the historians who have treated of the concerns of the outward sea. For they say that in their times there were seven islands situated in that sea which were sacred to Persephone, and three others of an immense magnitude one of which was consecrated to Pluto, another to Ammon, and that which was situated between them to Poseidon; the size of this last was no less than a thousand stadia. The inhabitants of this island preserved a tradition handed down from their ancestors concerning the existence of the Atlantic island of a prodigious magnitude, which had really existed in those seas; and which, during a long period of time, governed all the islands in the Atlantic ocean. Such is the relation of Marcellus in his Ethiopian history." Proc. in Tim. ("Cory's Fragments").

Now we have found a certain hint, faint perhaps, but nevertheless a direction, connecting possibly Prospero's island with Avalon, Ogygia, or the New Atlantis of Bacon, as to locality. We have no space to go into further arguments of this kind. But will produce another from a fresh point of view, and save being wearisome. It will be acknowledged that the New Atlantis of Bacon is an Utopia or an ideal Republic. We see very clearly that Bacon's Republic or Utopia, is only a reproduction, or at least copied from Plato's. It is for that reason that he places his Republic or Utopia, on the New Atlantis or the Old Atlantis of the Greek philosopher. When we examine Bacon's romance, we find it savours very much of a golden age, of a Heaven rather than of possible reality. At any rate, it is very curious that the Republic of America has sprung up in the direction (that is, the west) of his visionary island. This by the way only. Now, how is it we find Gonzalo in The Tempest picturing just such an impossible (except in heaven) Utopia as we now give, and which we re-find in the "New Atlantis" of Bacon?—

Gon. Had I plantation of this isle, my lord,—

Ant. He'd sow't with nettle-seed.

Seb. Or docks, or mallows.

Gon. And were the king on't, what would I do?

Seb. 'Scape being drunk for want of wine.

Gon. I' the commonwealth I would by contraries

Execute all things ; for no kind of traffic

Would I admit ; no name of magistrate ;

Letters should not be known ; riches, poverty,

And use of service, none ; contract, succession,

Bourn, bound of land, tilth, vineyard, none ;

No use of metal, corn, or wine, or oil ;

No occupation ; all men idle, all ;

And women too, but innocent and pure ;

No sovereignty ;—

Seb. Yet he would be king on't.

Ant. The latter end of his commonwealth forgets the beginning.

Gon. All things in common nature should produce

Without sweat or endeavour : treason, felony,

Sword, pike, knife, gun, or need of any engine,

Would I not have ; but nature should bring forth,

Of its own kind, all foison, all abundance,

To feed my innocent people."

It is indeed curious to find in these words exactly such a scheme of reformation, of impossibilities as is to be re-found in Bacon's "New Atlantis." Such things as these are only possible in Heaven or Paradise, and let us not be sure the words do not so apply to this island, as Elysium!¹ It seems to us the poet is again laughing in his sleeve at us. Bacon terms his New Atlantis sometimes, the College of the Six Days' Work, or Solomon's Temple. These titles refer us to Creation, as the work of the six days, and to the "mansion eternal in the heavens" of Art or Nature. We are introduced to a venerable elder, who is a sort of Father in the Atlantis, who is called Tirsan, a name which is a suspicious approach to an anagram upon the word Artis(t). We find Prospero in The Tempest, reverencing Gonzalo before all the rest. So we must not make light of anything he says—seeing that he is an emblem of faith, belief in impossibilities—and miracles—a spirit of hopeful persuasion, as against the incredulity of the others.

"Prospero. Holy Gonzalo, honourable man,
Mine eyes even sociable to the show of thine,
Fall fellowy drops."

Again—

"O good Gonzalo,
My true preserver and a loyal sir
To him thou follow'st."

Aristotle accepted the notion of there being a new continent in the west, and described it from the accounts of the Carthaginians, as a land opposite the Pillars of Hercules (Sts. of Gibraltar), fertile, well watered, and covered with forests (Arist. "De Mirab. Ancult," c. 84). Diodorus gives the Phœnicians the credit of having discovered it, and says that the temperature is not subject to violent changes (Diod. "Hist. Ed. Wessel," tom. i. p. 244).

We find Bacon's frontispiece presenting us with a ship sailing past the pillars of Hercules with the proud motto, Plus ultra. This idea is strong with him. And we find in the play of The Tempest the following allusions to pillars or columns:—

"Gon. Was Milan thrust from Milan, that his issue Should become kings of Naples? O, rejoice
Beyond a common joy, and set it down
With gold on lasting pillars: In one voyage
Did Claribel her husband find at Tunis
And Ferdinand, her brother, found a wife

Where he himself was lost, Prospero his dukedom
 In a poor isle and all of us ourselves
 When no man was his own."

Two pillars form the well-known masonic columns, and are pictured on the engraving prefacing the "New Atlantis."

Virgil's Mysteries.

We now proceed to deal with the play from the point of view already hinted at. That is, as a Spiritual play, being placed on an island, which is Heaven from one side (Prospero's), but until revealed is invisible to us as Hades. In the opening of the Heavens by Prospero we have undoubtedly, and we write this advisedly, a hint borrowed from the Mysteries, and particularly those Mysteries which revolved around the myth of Ceres and her wanderings in search of her lost child Proserpine. In Greek (their proper home) the respective names were Demeter and Persephone. We know that in all the initiations into the Mysteries—a symbolical death and a symbolical rebirth, were simulated. Indeed, they have survived the shipwrecks of Time. Upon the monument at Stratford we find it stated that the poet had the genius of Socrates and the art of Virgil. But the art of Virgil, perhaps, is more emphasised in his VIth Book of the "Æneid" than elsewhere. Ever since Warburton explained to the world the meaning of that book as Initiation, as the doctrines of the Mysteries, it has been accepted, and no one who knows anything of the subject can doubt that Virgil and Claudian have given us the best descriptions of what took place on those occasions, extant. Now it is very striking that we find in the play we are discussing a direct and curious dragging in of the names of Æneas and Dido, with whose histories every reader of Virgil must be well acquainted. Besides this, there are other parallels we shall point out. We now proceed to our task, asking the indulgence of our readers upon a very difficult subject.

We find the following resemblances between Virgil's description of Hell, or Acheron, and the circumstances attending the shipwrecked king, duke, and followers whilst upon the island.

When Charon calls out to Æneas to desist from entering farther, he says—

“Umbrarum hic locus est, Somni Noctisque Soporæ.”

“Here to reside delusive shades delight ;
For nought dwells here but sleep and drowsy night.”

Compare the strange drowsiness which falls upon Alonso and Gonzalo—

“Seb. What a strange drowsiness possesses them.
“Ant. It is the quality of the climate.”

The introduction of Ariel as Harpy has a direct parallel in Virgil's description of Hell—

“Centauri in foribus stabulant, Scyllæque bifformes,
Et centumgeminus Briareus, ac bellua Lernæ,
Horrendum stridens, flammisque armata Chimæra,
Gorgones Harpiaque, et forma tricorpori umbræ.”

“The centaurs harbour at the Gates, and double-formed Scyllas, the hundred-fold Briareus, the Snake of Lerna, hissing dreadfully, and Chimæra armed with flames, the Gorgons and the Harpies, and the shades of three-bodied form.”

We know that it was in the Vestibule in the Temple of Ceres (Demeter) that the Mystæ took the greater oath of secrecy, before the introduction to the principal ceremonial of the Greater Mysteries, which took place at midnight of the sixth day of this magnificent festival.

Plutarch writes :—

“To die is to be initiated into the great mysteries. . . . Our whole life is but a succession of errors, of painful wanderings, and of long journeys by tortuous ways, without outlet. At the moment of quitting it, fears, terrors, quiverings, mortal sweats, and a lethargic stupor come and overwhelm us ; but as soon as we are out of it we pass into delightful meadows, where the purest air is breathed, where sacred concerts and discourses are heard ; where, in short, one is impressed with celestial visions.”

It is there that man, having become perfect through his new initiation, restored to liberty, really master of himself, celebrates, crowned with myrtle, the most august mysteries, holds converse with just and pure souls, and sees with contempt the impure multitude of the profane or uninitiated, ever plunged and sinking of itself into the mire and in profound darkness."

The masque introduced in The Tempest is indeed a celestial vision! And we find again, in the words and description of life by Plutarch, as "a succession of errors, of painful wanderings, and of long journeys by tortuous ways without outlet," a wonderful parallel to the wanderings of Alonso, Sebastian, Antonio, Gonzalo, and Adrian about the enchanted island. Gonzalo exclaims—

"I can go no further, Sir,
My old bones ache : here's a maze, trod indeed,
Through forth-rights and meanders!"¹

But it is not only in this one point that the parallel holds. We find, from the date of the Shipwreck, a certain resemblance to the Mysteries, which cannot be fanciful, and which is strengthened upon further examination. For example, when Ariel boards the King's Ship, and "flames amazement," the King's son, Ferdinand, leaps into the sea, exclaiming—

"Hell is empty,
And all the devils are here."

We know that in the Mysteries the initiate was led through darkness and storm (or tempest), with lightning flashing through the vestibule of the Temple of Demêter or Ceres, which was a figurative descent into Hades. Stobæus writes—

"The first stage is nothing but errors and uncertainties, laborious wanderings, a rude and fearful march through night and darkness. And now arrived on the verge of death and initiation, everything wears a dreadful aspect, it is all horror, trembling, sweating, and affrightment. But this scene once over, a miraculous and divine light displays itself, and shining plains and flowery meads open on all hands before them."

The reader must be struck with the parallel afforded by the play. Because the Shipwrecked King and his Courtiers go through exactly these preliminary horrors, of an imaginary death by drowning, with storm, lightning, and thunder, and are led, through (their protagonist) Ferdinand, to the sublime spectacle of the opening Heavens, with the doctrine of Idealism to sum it all up. This finale proves that we have here not only Idealism, but the Idealism of the Mysteries, and with the Mysteries themselves portrayed to us. Yarker writes "Ancient Mysteries"—

"The principal ceremonial of the Greater Mysteries took place at midnight of the sixth day of this magnificent festival. The Herald made the usual proclamation, 'Far hence the profane.' Then the Mystæ took the greater oath of secrecy in the vestibule of the Temple of Demêter, was clothed in a fawn skin and saluted with the words, 'May you be happy, may the good Demon attend you.' At this point the assembly was enveloped in darkness, lightning flashed, thunder rolled, and monstrous forms appeared."

Compare this :—

"Ariel. I boarded the King's ship ; now on the beak,
Now in the waist, the deck, in every cabin,
I flamed amazement: sometimes I'd divide,
And burn in many places ; on the topmast,
The yards and bowsprit, would I flame distinctly,
Then meet and join : Jove's lightnings, the precursors
O' the dreadful thunder claps, more momentary,
And sight out-running were not : the fire, the cracks
Of sulphurous roaring, the most mighty Neptune
Seem'd to besiege, and make his bold waves tremble."

But it does not end here. The entire description of the wanderings of the Shipwrecked King and Courtiers about the island, is replete with amazements, terrors, and enchantments. In the first scene of the second act, they are affrighted with strange noises, which they take for the bellows of bulls, or the roaring of lions :—

“Leb. Even now we heard a hollow burst of bellowing
Like bulls, or rather lions ; did it not wake you ?
It struck mine ear most terribly.”

It was after this ceremony of the oath-taking in the vestibule, that at this point the assembly was enveloped in darkness, lightning flashed, thunder rolled, and monstrous forms appeared. This, of course, was a dramatic effect, contrived to imitate the horrors of the infernal regions. Virgil thus describes hell or Tartarus :—

“ Vestibulum ante ipsum, primisque in faucibus Orci
Luctus, et ultrices posuere cubilia Curæ ;—
Pallentesque habitant morbi, tristisque senectus,
Et metus, et mala suada Fames, acturpis egestas ;
Terribiles visu formæ ; Lethumque Laborque :
Tum consanguineus Lethi Sopor et mala mentis
Gudia, mortiferumque adverso in limine bellum
Ferrei que Eumenidum thalami, et Discordia demens, Vipereum crinem vittis innexa cruentis.
In medio ramos annosaque brachia pandit
Ulmus opaca igens : quam sedem somnia vulgo
Vana tenere ferunt, foliisque sub omnibus hærent.

“ Before the entrance itself, and in the first jaws of Hell, Grief and vengeful Cares have placed their couches ; pale Diseases inhabit there, and sad Old Age, and Fear, and Want, evil goddess of persuasion, and unsightly Poverty—forms terrible to contemplate ! and there, too, are Death and Toil ; then Sleep, akin to Death, and evil Delights of mind ; and upon the opposite threshold are seen death-bringing War, and the iron marriage-couches of the Furies, and raving Discord, with her viper-hair bound with gory wreaths. In the midst, an Elm dark and huge expands its boughs and aged limbs ; making an abode which vain Dreams are said to haunt, and under whose every leaf they dwell.”

We find in the play discord and fear, with the vain dreams of Sebastian and Antonio, as to the succession of Naples, even the toil of Ferdinand in removing logs, together with a plentiful supply of wanderings, doubts, and disappointments, all highly typical of life, and particularly of initiation.

In the snatching away of the banquet placed before the King and his followers, we have a metaphorical application of the fable of Tantalus, one of the punishments portrayed in the lower world or hell.

But the most cogent proof that in this play we have the heavenly side of the poet's art, is the introduction of the masque, when we see the heavens really opened to us, with a vision of Juno and Ceres. This is the culminating point of the play. It is the marriage of Miranda to Ferdinand—the marriage of Heaven and Earth—of Spirit to Matter—the reconciliation of things divine, with things material. And as this was the end and centre round which the Eleusinian Mysteries circled, we can well understand the introduction of Deméter (Ceres)—the earth mother (Nature)—to preside over the marriage of her daughter, Proserpine (who, as Bacon tells us, is Spirit), to Ferdinand. There can be little doubt (at least to ourselves), that Miranda is the prototype if not Persephone herself. Like Kronos, she sleeps until the time of her awakening is at hand.

“Prop. Here cease more questions.

Thou art inclined to sleep ; 'tis a good dulness,

And give it way : I know thou canst not choose.

[Miranda sleeps.”

Here we have Persephone asleep in Hades. Perdita again—the Briar Rose, who sleeps for hundreds of years (like Cinderella) as princess :—

“Pros. Now I arise : [Resumes his mantle.

Sit still, and hear the last of our sea-sorrow.

Here in this island we arrived ; and here

Have I, thy schoolmaster, made thee more profit

Than other princesses can that have more time

For vainer hours and tutors not so careful.

Truth (and we mean by this Spiritual Truth) has always been typified by a Princess brought up in disguise, like Perdita in the Winter's Tale, as a lost child.

That this introduction of Ceres as the earth, with Juno in the heavens (Iris being the rainbow or messenger of light that reconciles Heaven with Earth), is connected with a spiritual apotheosis and apocalypse, cannot be doubted. It is a Midsummer revelation.¹ It is Paradise opened with a divine reconciliation of things heavenly and things earthly: Juno with Ceres—the Spiritual with the Material. How can we for a moment be in doubt as to the protagonists in this marriage of Spirit and Matter? They are Miranda and Ferdinand; and it is for them, and in relation to them, that the masque is introduced and the blessing song of Juno and Ceres given! That we have heaven presented to us cannot be doubted in this scene:—

“Fer. Let me live here ever;
So rare a wonder’d father and a wife,
Make this place Paradise.”

That this is no metaphorical chance language may be seen when we compare again certain resemblances obtaining between the text and the Vith book of Virgil, which is universally acknowledged to be a description of initiation, and of the idealism taught in the Mysteries. For example, in Virgil’s description of the Elysian fields, we have:—

“Pars in gramineis exercent membra palæstris: Contendunt ludo, et fulva luctantur arena:”
—Vith Book “Æneid.”

Compare (Song):—

“Come unto these yellow sands
And then join hands,” etc., etc.

The exact words employed by Virgil. Then compare the extraordinary parallel running between the speech of Anchises and the speech of Prospero. Before we present this striking parallel, the student is entreated to bear in mind that the speech Virgil puts into the mouth of Anchises closes and sums up the teachings of the Mysteries, just as Prospero's closes the Vision or Masque.

“Principio cœlum ac terras, camposque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra,
Spiritus intus alit, totumque infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.”

What does this declare? That Spirit is the predominant and ruling element, which is mingled with the entire universe. Now compare this :—

“These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air :
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve ;
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams¹ are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.”

We have abundance of evidence that idealism was taught in the Mysteries. . We know that it was round the myth of the Wanderings of Ceres that these doctrines were taught, and in her Temple that the initiations and revelations took place. How is it Prospero is found summing up philosophic idealism in direct connection with the same Ceres? Is this chance? But let us first present the reader with the doctrines that were taught in the Mysteries. Ficinus says :—“Lastly, that I may comprehend the opinion of the ancient theologians, they considered things divine as the only realities, and that all others were only the images and shadows of truth.”¹ (Taylor's “Eleusinian Mysteries,” 13.) Life, in short (as Prospero says), is a dream—all we see—“the cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces, the solemn temples,” are only images—actors, with no reality save reflected reality—reflection of the spiritual—symbolic—and representative. We are like the prisoners in Plato's beautiful allegory of the subterranean cave, only contemplating shadows. "The earth-life is a dream rather than a reality. In this state and previous to the discipline of education and the mystical initiation, the rational or intellectual element, which Paul denominates the spiritual, is asleep." (Introduction to Taylor's "Eleusinian and Bacchic Mysteries," xvii.) Prospero, in disclosing the heavens and in giving us this sublime speech, is giving us the last sublime spectacle of the Mysteries and of the Idealism, which was summed up round that apocalyptic vision, and which we re-find unquestionably again in the Platonic Philosophy. The end was to teach the spiritual nature of existence.

¹ The entire teaching of the Mysteries held at Eleusis, round Ceres, was that life is a dream.

In these few lines, "We are such stuff as dreams are made on," is summed up Plato. For his whole teaching is that life is a dream. If the author of these lines was not Platonist, and idealist, in the most uncompromising sense, then evidence goes for nothing:—

ὄρῳ γὰρ ἡμᾶς οὐδέν ὄντας ἄλλο, πλὴν εἰδῶλ', ὅσοι περ ζῶμεν, ἢ κούφην σκιάν.—Ajax, 125-6. Sophocles.

"I see we're nothing else, just as we are,
But dreams: our life is but a fleeting shadow."

Pindar has a similar expression:—

Ἐπάμεροι, τι δε τις; τι δ' οὐ τις;
Σκιᾶς ὄναρ γ' ἀνθρώπων.—Carth. II. ἡ. 135.

"What are we, what not, but ephemera!
The shadow of a dream is man."

A similar idea comes from the Talmud:—"The life of man is like a passing shadow; not the shadow of a house, or a tree, but of the bird that flies: in a moment, both bird and shadow is gone." The German philosopher, Schopenhauer, has noticed this resemblance of Shakespeare to Sophocles. He adds:—"Life and dream are leaves of one and the same book: actual life is a reading in casual connection, but a dream is only here and there a leaf, without order or dependence."

Now let us mark again these important facts. We find the poet introducing a masque into this play, in which the great Protagonist of the Eleusinian Mysteries is presented to us. It was the Earth-Mother Demêter or (her Latin name) Ceres, round whom the Mysteries revolved. And it was over the loss and reawakening of her daughter Persephone, or Proserpine, that the Drama found its origin, and the doctrine of immortality its focus and symbol.

The poet does not bring in Ceres without making her speak of her daughter's abduction by " dusky Dis " or Pluto :—

" Ceres. Since they did plot
The means that dusky Dis my daughter got."

This shows at once that it is the myth of Ceres and Proserpine that is the undercurrent motive of this masque introduction.

Very strangely, the word Tempest is allied to the word Soul. Θύμης—the soul, is derived by Plato (Crat. 419) from θύω, which means to rush on or along, as of a rushing mighty wind, and generally signifies to storm, to rage. It is employed in the Greek in the same sense as the Latin, animus (the soul)—as the seat of anger and wrath, and of the feelings. Again the Greek ἀνῆμι means to "breathe hard or blow," and is commonly used as to toss or wave about. The Latin word, Spiritus, is in the same way connected with air, or breath, as life. Water has always been considered the emblem of the soul. And we find in The Tempest the poet gives us a curious expression in the words "sea-change." In the song that Ariel sings, we find these lines :—

" Full fathoms five thy father lies ;
Of his bones are coral made ;
Those are pearls that were his eyes :
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change,
Into something rich and strange."

This "sea-change into something rich and strange" is doubtless used here in the sense of rebirth or metempsychosis. These lines, we think, are on Shelley's monument. And there is about the expression "sea-change," a soul character connected with the sea and with death—a Protæan power of changing shapes, which is borne out when we remember that the fabled Proteus was Neptune's herdsman. Thus we have in the title of the play The Tempest, and in the sea, a double connection with the idea of spirit and soul, change or death.

Max Müller deduces the Latin mare (the sea) from a root signifying death. He says, "If in English we can speak of dead water, meaning stagnant water, or if the French use eau morte in the same sense, why should not the northern Aryans have divined one of their names for the sea from the root mar to die?" Littré—"Corssen et Curtius rapprochent mare du Sancrit māru, le désert, c'est-à-dire, l'élément mort, stérile, αργυριστος ποταμος." But as deserts are not only in appearance, but in origin, beds of dried-up oceans, or seas, this only shows still more the origin of the word. We find, in all myths of the dead, a connecting link with the sea or water. King Arthur, after receiving his wound, departs in a barge for Avalon. The souls of the departed are often found taking ship for some distant isle. Thus the sea becomes an emblem for death,—“a sea-change into something rich and strange,” and thus we are led to see that the ocean of this art may well be a term embracing time and death—a separating medium of re-birth, through which and on which we seek the enchanted island of discovery, which is that of pure Spirit or Heaven,—the blessed or fortunate islands of the soul,—where the dead poet, as a still living spirit, presides as creator, over his Divine Nature. It is very curious how unconsciously writers on the plays have made this comparison. Here is one:—

“The greatest poet of our age has drawn a parallel of elaborate eloquence between Shakespeare and the sea; and the likeness holds good in many points of less significance than those which have been set down by the master-hand. For two hundred years at least have students of every kind put forth in every sort of boat on a longer or a shorter voyage of research across the waters of that unsounded sea.”

The sea has always been connected with the idea of generation or re-birth. It may seem extraordinary, that the great “Deep” was held to be the feminine side of things, out of whose womb all things sprang, even the land. At the Eleusinian Mysteries, one of the days was dedicated to a visit to the sea. Purification by water has always been the symbol of re-birth. It is through the watery principle that everything was created. God breathed on the face of the waters, so that as a separating medium the sea is a perfect emblem of death. We find the poet telling us that the sea is to be this separating medium :—

“ Let this sad interim like the ocean be
Which parts the shore, where two contracted new
Come daily to the banks, that, when they see
Return of love, more blest may be the view ;
Else call it winter, which being full of care
Makes summer's welcome thrice more wish'd, more rare.”

Here the time of “ this sad interim ” is compared to the Ocean, or to Winter and Summer, which immediately takes us to the Winter's Tale. In Pericles we find an early attempt at the same subject, the sea playing there the part of a separating medium as Time—the body of Thaisa being cast adrift on it, to come miraculously to life again. Indeed, between Marina, the sea-born, and Perdita in the Winter's Tale, there is more than a striking resemblance. Marina is born of the sea—Time. Perdita, likewise, is thrown out to be the argument of Time.

“ To speak of Perdita, now grown in grace
Equal with wondering : what of her ensues
I list not prophesy ; but let Time's news
Be known when 'tis brought forth. A shepherd's daughter,
And what to her adheres, which follows after,
Is the argument of Time. Of this allow,
If ever you have spent time worse ere now ;
If never, yet that Time himself doth say
He wishes earnestly you never may.

What and who is Perdita ? Answer—the Spirit or Spiritual in the poet's art, to be re-born through Time, as yet asleep in the Hades (invisible place) of this art—Miranda under another name.

Morgan Kavanagh writes (“ Origin of Language and Myths,” pages 46, 47) :—

“That in M and W we have the same sign in different positions is shown by such a word as Mind, which has under this form no meaning; but when we make M take its form W, we discover the primary sense of Mind on perceiving that it is Wind. And this etymology cannot be called in question since the Hebrew רוּחַ ruh, the Greek πνεύμα, and the Latin Spiritus, each of which means Mind, are but other words for wind or breath, and of which the learned have been well aware, though never suspecting that Mind is the word Wind itself. This etymology is also confirmed by the word Wit, and the word Mensch in German giving our word Wench. When years ago I pointed out the identity of M and W, I was ridiculed for my pains, and little thought that the truth of my discovery could be made evident by the Sanskrit language, of which the W is often represented in Latin by M. Thus in a recent work we find, ‘La naso-labiale M remplace souvent en latin la labiale douce prolongée aryaque W; ainsi nous trouvons Mare, mer, au lieu du, Sanscrit Wari ;’ Etc. (“La Langue Latine étudiée dans l’unité Indo-Européenne. Par Amédée de Caix de Saint Aymour,” p. 77.) We thus see that it is in perfect accord with the presentation of Prospero as a God (in relation to his art), that the play bears the name of The Tempest. It is Prospero’s Mind, that is moved to stir up this storm, which is but a picture of his Divine Art at war with Time, and separated from us by just those creative principles spiritually hidden, which are spirit on one side, and on the other the separating medium of the sea, the symbol of the external and phenomenal.¹

Sirens and the Sea.

Sirens were said by the Greek and Latin poets to entice seamen by the magic sweetness of their song to such a degree, that the listeners forgot everything and died of hunger. The Greek means (αἰσθη) the charm of eloquence of persuasion, and is derived from seira (αισιρα), the entangling binding.¹ Plato says there are three kinds of Sirens—the celestial, the generative, the cathartic. The first are under the government of Jupiter; the second under the government of Neptune; and the third under the government of Pluto. When the soul is in heaven the Sirens seek by harmonic motion to unite it to the divine life of the celestial host; and when in Hades, to conform them to the infernal regimen; but on earth they produce generation of which the sea is emblematic. (Proclus "On the Theology of Plato," bk. vi.)

¹ In the beginning was first Light, then Water. The latter was the material.

We have placed the last line in italics. We see that the sea is emblematic of generation, that is, of re-birth, or what the poet in the play exquisitely veils under the garb of an immortal "sea-change." Ariel sings of Ferdinand's father:—

"Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change

Ariel is disguised as a Sea-nymph. Why does the poet present us Ariel as a Sea-nymph and not as a mountain-nymph, or a tree-nymph, or as a Naiad or Spring-nymph? Is there no profound connection between this song, in which we have reference to the sea as generator or transformer and Ariel's disguise? Nymphs were generally Goddesses of fertilising moisture and powers of nature. In later poets water is called νιμφη (Latin Lympha, probably from the water nymphs of Liban, i., 283; Wyttenb. Plut. ii. 147; F. Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon, 1060). The chrysalis or pupa of moths, and of young bees with imperfect wings, carry this name of nymph in Greek,—showing that the word is clearly connected with the doctrine of metamorphosis. The sea is the generator, the Protean—the changer—the source of souls—and her nymphs are the magic powers which preside over generation. But there is another way in which we find this word Nymphs employed, viz., as Muses—hence all persons in a state of rapture, as seers, poets, madmen, &c., were said to be caught by the nymphs (νυμφοληται, Lat. Lymphati—Lymphatici. 1060, Scott and Lidd. Gr. Lex.). It is just in this last sense that we see Ariel, drawing Ferdinand after him, with his songs and music—“Fer. Where should this music be ! i' the air or the earth ?

It sounds no more : and sure it waits upon
Some god of the island. Sitting on a bank
Weeping again the king my father's wreck,
This music crept by upon the waters,
Allaying both their fury, and my passion,
With its sweet air : thence I have follow'd it,
Or it hath drawn me rather. But 'tis gone.
No, it begins again.”

It is a significant hint that Ariel is set free by Prospero at the termination of the play, and that this play is the last the poet writes. The breaking of his wand, seems to us profoundly connected with the emancipation of Ariel. This tricky Spirit is so evidently the poet's airy genius, that draws all the world after its divine music, that it seems superogatory to endeavour to adduce even proofs of it. Ariel is the genius or instrumentality of the poet's entire art scheme ;—the rough magic of art which is nothing short of a miracle, as yet no miracle, because only half realised.

For our own part, we have very little doubt that the island of Prospero is just that island of discovery which we are all seeking upon the ocean of his art. We mean that it is the art itself in relation to itself, which, to the shipwrecked mariners, appears without anybody upon it, without hope, full of meanders and strange miracles, and divine music leading us on, but apparently without a God, full of mystery and magic, but without an author who will reveal himself and lay aside his magic mantle. There is much resemblance between the nineteenth century and the play of The Tempest. We are the shipwrecked mariners of Faith, who, like Sebastian and Antonio, have lost all hope and all belief in everything—and particularly in God. Prospero, be it remarked, is a complete parallel as Poetic Creator to a Divine Creator. We see that the relationship of Prospero to his art, with his magic mantle and rod, is plainly and intentionally that of a God in art. Is it not, then, striking that the Wanderers upon the island are divided into two divisions of opinion—the one in Gonzalo and Adrian, being characterised by the Strongest Faith and hope, and the others by mocking scepticism and ridicule? The second act with which the Shipwrecked party is introduced, opens in Gonzalo's faith, hope, and consolation, which is remorselessly scoffed at and turned into utter ridicule by the others. So lofty is Gonzalo's faith, and belief in impossible things and miracles, that he seems to us a species of personified religion. The others are his direct antitheses—they believe in nothing—not even in the Truth when it is Truth, as in the case where Gonzalo tells them Tunis is Carthage. As a modern novelist truly writes:—

“Doubt is the destroyer of beauty—the poison in the sweet cup of existence—the curse which mankind have brought on themselves. Avoid it as you would the plague. Believe in anything or everything miraculous and glorious—the utmost reach of your faith can with difficulty grasp, the majestic reality and perfection of everything you can see, desire, or imagine.” (“A Romance of Two Worlds.”) What does the nineteenth century require—a miracle? No—because we have abundant of miracles every day, such as the Phonograph of Edison (which beats everything that poet or “Arabian Nights” could conceive)—but this is no miracle. This is science! A miracle must be unexplainable. But then the nineteenth century (which is almost as profound in its sceptical knowledge as in its real ignorance), would exclaim—prove this a miracle; and so on. So that our eyes refuse to see that all is supernatural and nothing is supernatural, but all Wonder.

There can be no didactic force in this art of the plays, unless its teaching applies doubly to itself and Nature. We mean that what we are seeking to have solved for us in life, shall be solved for us by this art. This may seem difficult to grasp. Let us endeavour to be clear. This art, according to us, is self-reflecting—that is, that what we are seeking outside it is already within it. Suppose a complete revelation is planned, suppose our own mocking portraits are presented to us everywhere in these plays, and presented, too, in exactly the relationship that we are to it. Impossible! Nay, it has been done, but it is very difficult to make clear how it has been done, though we can see it very plainly for ourselves. For example: suppose (or grant) Prospero to be an ideal portrait of God in relationship to the Divine Art, Nature, and, at the same time, to be the Author of the Plays in relationship to the plays (also his Divine Art or Nature) and us. Cannot the reader at once perceive that the most Divine lessons could be thus inculcated—that we should be beside ourselves with utter amazement and admiration! If the Poet-Creator, Prospero, can hide and reveal himself by means of art such as the plays contain (as a God), what a lesson for us towards faith and hope, and understanding of the higher works of the Diviner Poet, and his works, the Almighty! That the author has done this is clearly shown in the Sonnets to those who, having eyes, will use them, by shutting them to the external in this Divine Art, and opening them to the Spiritual. For example: when the poet says he has “laid great bases for eternity,” we are sure that he means he has illustrated, by means of his art, divine truths and imitated Creation, so as to reconstruct faith and belief in Miracle. He tells us, in these despised Sonnets (which constitute the Spiritual Light and New Life of the Creative Principles, underlying the construction of the plays) that he bears with his “extern” “the canopy” of Heaven!

CXXV.

“Were’t aught to me I bore the canopy,
With my extern the outward honouring,
Or laid great bases for eternity.”

He tells us again, in Sonnet 124, that this art was built far from accident, i.e., that plan, intention, govern its inner spiritual meaning, and that it "stands hugely politic"—

"No, it was builded far from accident ;
It suffers not in smiling pomp, nor falls
Under the blow of thrall'd discontent,
Whereto the inviting time our fashion calls :
It fears not policy, that heretic,
Which works on leases of short-number'd hours,
But all alone stands hugely politic."

For ourselves, we understand these lines to mean that this art is as profound, as deep as Creation itself, for it is Creation in a sense that the world has never dreamt of as within the bounds of man or art to conceive or execute. He tells us he bears the "canopy" of the heavens, by means of great bases of creative truths, which, when revealed, shall stand for eternity. But until his own judgment arises, which is as surely in the plays as God is in Nature, he dwells in lovers' eyes—

"'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity
Shall you pace forth ; your praise shall still find room,
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.
So, till the judgment that yourself arise,
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes."

There are three themes contained in many of the plays, if not all, which are not historical. These three themes are first, the simple theme of beauty, as the plays simply read without further examination. The other two themes arise from the relation of this art, to its planned spiritual revelation through time (as to itself), and to the relationship arising from this plan to Nature, and ourselves. We see this in the Winter's Tale, where the separation of this art into Winter (unrevealed), and Summer (revealed) side, is plainly imaged in the separation of Perdita from Hermione—Spirit separated from dead life (form)—a statue Hermione. The restoration of the life of the Spirit—Perdita (Persephone) restores life to this art, which is so beautifully pictured as a statue (really living), seemingly dead until revealed. But the poet himself tells us this—that in each play, there are three themes :—

“ Fair, kind, and true, is all my argument,—
 Fair, kind, and true, varying to other words ;
 And in this change is my invention spent,
 Three themes in one, which wondrous scope affords.
 Fair, kind, and true, have often liv'd alone,
 Which three, till now, never kept seat in one.”

To prove that this art is something to which the term extraordinary, as usually employed, cannot be applied, we quote the following Sonnet. We see at once, that the author ignores Dante, as his inferior, for he goes back five hundred years for a comparison to vie with the wonder of “ your frame.”

LIX.

“ If there be nothing new, but that which is Hath been before, how are our brains beguil'd,
 Which, labouring for invention, bear amiss
 The second burden of a former child !
 O, that record could with a backward look,
 Even of five hundred courses of the sun,
 Show me your image in some antique book,
 Since mind at first in character was done !
 That I might see what the old world could say
 To this composed wonder of your frame ;
 Whether we are mended, or whe'r better they,
 Or whether revolution be the same.
 O, sure I am, the wits of former days
 To subjects worse have given admiring praise.”

“ Since mind at first in character was done ! ” This is indeed startling language. This is something “ hors de ligne ” when it puts its term of comparison back to five hundred years, and thus challenges Dante's great work ! In The Tempest, we find Prospero saying : —

“ My dukedom since you have given me again,
 I will requite you with as good a thing ;
 At least bring forth a wonder to content ye.”

And to further prove that the poet deals in his plays with a religious theme, which (mark it) is as yet hidden or unrevealed, he says, in Sonnet 31 :—

“ How many a holy and obsequious tear
Hath dear religious love stol'n from mine eye,
As interest of the dead, which now appear
But things remov'd, that hidden in thee lie ! ”

Note that these things which move his “religious love” are “hidden,” “remov'd,” in this art. Proof enough, if any were indeed wanting, to show that we know very little about the plays at present, and that the great “bases for eternity” are yet to be explored. Perhaps the “great bases for eternity” are these religious truths, hidden in philosophical play systems, as creative principles !

The despised Sonnets are the true creative principles of the entire Solar System of this sublime art. We use no extravagant metaphor, we say seriously, and fully alive to a charge of writing rubbish,—a real Solar System,—a copy of Nature, not only externally, but on the profoundest philosophical creative principles of Light and Darkness, Summer and Winter, Life and Death, Heaven and Hell, separation and reconciliation. Here, for example, is the Sun—unnmistakably not only here but elsewhere Light, Life, Truth,—a physical fact and a spiritual emblem at once.

LIII.

“ What is your substance, whereof are you made,
That millions of strange shadows on you tend ?
Since every one hath, every one, one shade,
And you, but one, can every shadow lend.
Describe Adonis, and the counterfeit
Is poorly imitated after you ;
On Helen's cheek all art of beauty set,
And you in Grecian tires are painted new :
Speak of the spring, and foison of the year ;
The one doth shadow of your beauty show,
The other as your bounty doth appear ;
And you in every blessed shape we know.
In all external grace you have some part,
But you like none, none you, for constant heart.”

This is the Sun. Read Sir George Cox's "Mythology of the Aryans," and you will find him identifying Adonis and Helen with the Sun. This may seem curious to some people, but every book on mythology and symbol worship gives the same explanation.¹ Let us turn to the poem of Venus and Adonis, the first heir of the poet's invention, and we find the first opening lines identifying Adonis with the Sun:—

*“ Even as the sun with purple-colour'd face
Had ta'en his last leave of the weeping morn,
Rose-cheek'd Adonis hied him to the chase ;
Hunting he lov'd, but love he laugh'd to scorn ;
Sick-thoughted Venus makes amain unto him,
And like a bold-fac'd suitor 'gins to woo him.”*

“ Even as the sun ;” and to further prove this, take the following—a few lines following the passage just quoted:—

“ Nature that made thee, with herself at strife, Saith that the world hath ending with thy life.”

Nature would indeed end with the life of the Sun! And then the poem proceeds to use the same argument of marriage for creation's sake, as we find in the opening theme of the Sonnets. But this is the simile—marriage for the sake of offspring—(immortality), with which Socrates (using the words of Diotima) illustrates Creation Divine and poetic. With Plato the poet's art is a copy of the Divine act, whence the name of Maker, Creator, Poet.

“ Torches are made to light, jewels to wear,
Dainties to taste, fresh beauty for the use,

¹ “ Here is what Sir William Jones—a man profoundly acquainted with as many as twenty languages, and beyond all doubt the most learned Oriental scholar England has to boast of—says on this subject: ‘ We must not be surpris'd at finding, on a close examination, that the characters of all the pagan deities, male and female, melt into each other, and at last into one or two; for it seems a well-founded opinion that the whole crowd of gods and goddesses in ancient Rome mean only the powers of nature, and principally those of the sun, expressed in a variety of ways and by a multitude of fanciful names.’—(“ Origin of Lang. and Myth.,” Kavanagh.)

Herbs for their smell, and sappy plants to bear ;
 Things growing to themselves are growth's abuse :
 Seeds spring from seeds, and beauty breedeth beauty,
 Thou wast begot,—to get it is thy duty."

But to further prove this apparently strange theory (and of the difficulty of obtaining a hearing for it we are well aware), take the following Sonnet :—

XXXVIII.

" How can my Muse want subject to invent,
 While thou dost breathe, that pour'st into my verse
 Thine own sweet argument, too excellent
 For every vulgar paper to rehearse ?
 O, give thyself the thanks, if aught in me
 Worthy perusal stand against thy sight ;
 For who's so dumb that cannot write to thee,
 When thou thyself dost give invention light ?
 Be thou the tenth Muse, ten times more in worth
 Than those old nine which rhymers invoke ;
 And he that calls on thee, let him bring forth
 Eternal numbers to outlive long date.
 If my slight Muse do please these curious days,
 The pain be mine, but thine shall be the praise."

Here we have the source of the inspiration of the poet's Muse, which it is most important, the greatest thing of all to remark, is not one of the nine Muses, nor the Nine Muses. What is it, then, that overleaps all the Muses and beggars all our conceptions of art thus ? What miracle have we here ? What is this Tenth Muse ? Plato tells us the world was formed in the shape of X. This number is a perfect number, and various theories have explained it, which we have no space to enter upon here. But it is the sign of the World, or of entire Nature—it signifies life and light—the two triangles of above and below—the universe.

 Than those old nine which rhymers invoke."

How can we be in error after such words as these :—

" For who's so dumb that cannot write to thee
 When thou thyself dost give invention light ?"

This is the Sun. It is not only here, but everywhere, that we find this Sun in these Sonnets.

XLIII.

“ When most I wink, then do mine eyes best see,
 For all the day they view things unrespected ;
 But when I sleep, in dreams they look on thee,
 And, darkly bright, are bright in dark directed.
 Then thou, whose shadow shadows doth make bright,
 How would thy shadow's form form happy show
 To the clear day with thy much clearer light,
 When to unseeing eyes thy shade shines so !
 How would, I say, mine eyes be blessed made
 By looking on thee in the living day,
 When in dead night thy fair imperfect shade
 Through heavy sleep on sightless eyes doth stay !
 All days are nights to see, till I see thee,
 And nights bright days, when dreams do show thee me.”

It will be difficult to convince a sceptical world in a sceptical century, that the above Sonnet is addressed to Sun and Moon, and that both are applied to art. But it is so. It only requires Gonzalo's faith to see what the poet has done—to believe in artistic miracles—for here is one, and find Prospero. The reader may laugh, if we suggest that the Sonnet quoted has particular reference to the shadows of art. Does he know Plato's allegory of the subterranean cavern, and the invisible sun producing images or shadows? I suppose he knows that this image is Plato's method for explaining the relationship of ideas to phenomena—reflection. And this is the exact relationship existing between the ideas of the plays, and their phenomena, shadows, or actors taken externally.¹ The poet is saying—“ If the reflection of my spiritual meaning or light (the Sun), can produce such beauty (which is night—Moonlight to me), what would the daylight of its revelation be?” It will be granted, for the sake of illustration, that if the poet has planned such a revelation, or rebirth, as we postulate, we only know the night-side or reflected side of his real spiritual light or meaning. It may seem daylight to us, but to him (until revealed) it is only Night and Moonlight. For Moonlight is the reflected light of an invisible Sun. We maintain the plays, simply taken as plays, are only half known, and that we gaze upon the moonlight of their real light. With such a theory we are prepared to apply this Sonnet to the Midsummer Night's Dream particularly. For that deals with Moonlight, with night, and dreams, and very plainly, as we have shown elsewhere, with the relationship of this art to Nature and to itself.¹

“Prospero. A solemn air, and the best comforter
To an unsettled fancy, cure thy brains,
Now useless boi'd within thy skull.”

“The charm dissolves apace ;
And as the morning steals upon the night,
Melting the darkness, so their rising senses
*Begin to chase the ignorant fumes that manile
Their clearer reason*.”

Such lines as these prove the character and quality of the relations of Prospero to the shipwrecked wanderers upon his island. It is their “clearer reason” which has been befogged and closed up. There is “no darkness but ignorance,” says the poet elsewhere. And as the play has gradually led up from the vicissitude of imaginary death—tempest, lightning, confusion, wanderings, discord, and error—to the sublime apocalyptic vision of the Masque or heaven, so do we see in this process the end and aim of the initiations of the Mysteries of Eleusis pourtrayed to us. The end and aim of those Mysteries was to reveal heavenly things, to enlighten the unenlightened, and to present the gods in the final scene, as creators and masters of the revels.

So Prospero as creator, as the magician of this enchanted art—as the great Master-Spirit of his creative cycle—is portrayed as surrounded by the ocean, on an island, which as an island of souls, as a mythical Heaven, is invisible except to the Spirit, and to those Spirits who set out on a voyage of discovery, on the ocean of his illimitable Wisdom.

CHAPTER IV.

VENUS AND ADONIS.

“Forte est vinum, fortior est rex, fortiores sunt muliers; super omnia vincit veritas.”—1st Æd., ch. iiii., ver. 10, 12.

How is it that the first heir of Shakespeare's invention (if it was Shakespeare's?) is found to be upon the subject of Venus and Adonis, the latter being the key figure, or myth centre round which the society of the Rosy Cross and their emblem revolve? How is it that these plays and poems still present a like mystery and question of authorship, that is thoroughly Rosicrucian in its silence, profundity, and inscrutability? “To come down hidden through the ages is sublime,” writes De Quincey of them; but does not the problem of the plays and sonnets, as to meaning and authorship, thoroughly suggest something of the same sort? There are parallels of date between the publication of the plays, the death of Shakespeare, and the society, which seem to stand out significantly when placed side-by-side with each other. To this we have already alluded, but we must allude to it again. In 1623, when the first folio edition is put forth, there is a great Rosicrucian meeting held in Paris, which made a great stir for two years in that capital. The year 1616 (Shakespeare's death), several of the manifestoes of importance are published. In fact, the entire rise of Rosicrucianism and the noise it made, commences early in the seventeenth century and expires about 1630, four years after Bacon's death; and we hear no more about it, except through apologists like John Heydon, who borrow Bacon's “Atlantis” to illustrate or identify the Society with his College of the Six Days. Then we have, in 1646, a Masonic meeting at Warrington, where Bacon is again brought in, according to Nicolai, as one of the Rosicrucians, if not the head! Nicolai, be it observed, lived a century ago, and was nearer the sources of oral tradition than we are now.

De Quincey (like Mr Waite, in his "Real History of the Rosicrucians") in his "Historico-Critical Inquiry into the Origin of the Rosicrucians and the Freemasons," questions their existence before the seventeenth century. At any rate they made no stir, no noise, prior to the publication of the "Fama Fraternalitatis." They may have been a reorganization, a resurrection of older societies, such as the Templars, or of older sects, but in the form they startled Europe, they present to us the idea of a total reconstruction and new inception. They seem to have been Literati as well as Illuminati, and in this we see their connection with literature. It may be as well to remember that Dante, who was a member of the order of Templars, makes his art a vehicle of reformation, using the secret language or jargon of his brotherhood, called the gay-science. We find, in the Sonnets, this secret language hinted at, in most unmistakable terms. Dante's work cannot be understood by those who have not seized the Anti-papal spirit of his times. No better work exists upon the subject than Rossetti's (father of the late poet) "Anti-papal Spirit which preceded the Reformation." Literature indeed, especially allegorical literature like Dante's or Rabelais', was especially fitted to ridicule, and attack the abuses of an age, in which no other weapons were possible. We find that Dante's City of Dis, is nothing but Rome, even to the extent of its walls. Now we must not imagine that Bacon's and Shakespeare's age was much beyond Dante's in this matter. We have only to recall a few facts, to immediately realise the barbarity of the age, which was a species of world prison. To step out into the air, was to step into one's "grave," as Hamlet says to Polonius. The windlace, the gyves, were ready to torture, the prison or stake to consummate the martyrdom of Truth. Just take a few examples that come to memory at once. Bruno burnt, 1600; Ramus massacred, and Campanella, author of the "City of the Sun" (a pupil of Telesius, so much commended by Bacon with whose Atlantis there are striking parallels), tortured; John Selden—one of Bacon's translators, and literary executors—had to apologize; Des Cartes, to conceal his book; Spinoza, excommunicated; Galileo, to recant upon his knees.—These are only a few. Do we not see how urgently an universal reformation of society was needed, and how opportune and profound the scheme of the Rosicrucians? What was its object? What could it perform? Very little, apparently, but probably a very great deal more than we can as yet realise or imagine. And, first of all, we believe its aim was to make literature the vehicle of its reformation. We have this hinted in the frequent allusions to Apollo and Parnassus, to the Muses and the Castalian Spring. We find the Sonneteers embracing an universal style after the fashion of the love sonneteers of the Renaissance early period, of Petrarch, Boccaccio and Dante, addressing a lady of their loves, as Dante does Beatrice, and writing in a language which is profoundly philosophical, and difficult to clearly understand. We imagine we comprehend it, but we are mistaken. And this is shown in the incapability of the modern world to separate the Stella of Sidney from Lady Rich, or the Black-mistress of the Sonnets, of the supposed author Shakespeare, from a real person. But these, like Dante's Beatrice, are metaphysical concepts, personified for art and safety's sake,—they are philosophical abstractions.

"Adonis or Adonai was an Oriental title of the Sun, signifying Lord; and the boar supposed to have killed him, was the emblem of Winter; during which the productive powers of nature being suspended, Venus was said to lament the loss of Adonis until he was again restored to life: whence both the Syrian and Argive women annually mourned his death and celebrated his resurrection. Adonis was said to pass six months with Proserpine, and six with Venus." (Section 120, R. P. Knight's "Inquiry into Symb. Lang. of Ancient Art and Mythology.") Compare (Hesych. in V. Macrob. Sat. i. c. xx.) Adonis with Dionysis or Bacchus. Τὸν δὲ

Ἀδωνί ουχ ἴτερον ἀλλὰ Διόνυσον εἶναι νομιζούσιν. (Plutarch Symp. lib. iv. qu. v. ; also Lucian de Dea Syria. Pausan. Corinth c. xx., S. 5.)

“The story of the Phoenix appears to have been an allegory of the same kind.” (Ibid.)

“The Phrygian Attis, like the Syrian Adonis, was fabled to have been killed by a boar ; or, according to another tradition, by Mars in the shape of that animal ; and his death and resurrection were annually celebrated in the same manner.” (Section 121, ibid.)

“In the poetical tales of the ancient Scandinavians, Frey, the deity of the Sun, was fabled to have been killed by a boar ; which was therefore annually offered to him at the great feast of Iuul during the Winter solstice. Boars of paste were also served on their tables during that feast ; which being kept till the following spring, were beaten to pieces and mixed with the seeds to be sown in the ground.” This Boar is Mars or Winter, who is at war with Venus. We find in the Sonnets that the poet identifies Adonis with the Sun,—and with the Rose, as we shall show very clearly.

The story of Venus and Mars circles round the universe, as the two antagonistic powers of Love and Warfare, or “Strife and Friendship,” as Bacon terms it. Harmonia or Hermione, was their offspring, being the orderly world, or product of the great dualism everywhere perceptible in Nature, under the physical names of Heat and Cold,—Repulsion and Attraction. These laws govern the universe, and keep the solar system under law. For what is Attraction (or what we term Gravitation) but Love, whilst Heat or Fire produces separation, repulsion,—in other words, warfare or hate. It is the orderly conflict or antagonism of these two, alternating with Winter or Summer (which is the alternate triumph of one over the other), that constitutes the year. We see, then, that the death of Adonis, “the pleasure of the fleeting year,” or Summer, at the tusks of a boar, is merely allegorical for the death of Summer at the hands of Winter. We can see that the poet consciously embodies this idea. Because we find him in his first poem identifying the Sun with Adonis, and again the latter with Summer and the rose :—

“ How like a Winter hath my absence been
 From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year ?
 What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen ?
 What old Decembers bareness every where ?
 And yet this time remov'd was summer's time,
 The teeming Autumn big with rich increase,
 Bearing the wanton burthen of the prime,
 Like *widowed wombes*¹ after their Lord's decease :
 Yet this abundant issue seem'd to me,
 But hope of Orphans, and un-fathered fruit.
 For Summer and his pleasures wait on thee,
 And thou away, the very birds are mute.
 Or if they sing, 'tis with so dull a cheer,
 That leaves look pale, dreading the Winter's near.”

“ From you have I been absent in the spring,
 When proud pied April (drest in all his trim)
 Hath put a spirit of youth in every thing :
 That heavy Saturn laught and leapt with him,
 Yet nor the lays of birds, nor the sweet smell
 Of different flowers in odour and in hue,
 Could make me any summer's story tell :
 Or from their proud lap pluck them where they grew.
 Nor did I wonder at the Lilies white,
 Nor praise the deep Vermilion in the Rose,
 They were but sweet, but figures of delight :
 Drawn after you, you pattern of all those.
 Yet seem'd it winter still, and you away.”

The Lily and the Rose are two purely Rosicrucian flowers particularly associated with the order. The Fleur-de-lis is connected with the symbol of Light, as Lux, and the Rose is Adonis. Study the Sonnets quoted, and you will at once see it is addressed to the Sun, as the pattern and exemplar of Nature, which is revealed as the cause of Summer.

“For summer and his pleasures wait on thee,

Here is winter during the sun's absence :—

“How like a Winter hath my absence been
From thee the pleasure of the fleeting year.”

Compare—

“And so of you, beauteous and lovely youth,
When that shall fade, my verse distils your truth.”

—54th Sonnet.

Dr Alger writes (“Doctrine of a Future Life”) :—“It is a well-known fact, intimately connected with the different religions of Greece and Asia-Minor, that during the times of harvest in the autumn, and again at the season of sowing in the spring, the shepherds, the vintagers, and the people in general, were accustomed to observe certain sacred festivals,—the autumnal sad,—the vernal joyous. These undoubtedly grew out of the deep sympathy between man and nature, over the decay and disappearance, the revival and return of vegetation. When the hot season had withered the verdure of the fields, plaintive songs were sung, their wild melancholy notes and snatches borne abroad by the breeze, and their echoes dying at last in the distance. In every instance, these mournful strains were the annual lamentation of the people over the death of some mythical boy of extraordinary beauty and promise, who in the flower of youth, was suddenly drowned, or torn in pieces by wild beasts.

“‘Some Hyacinthine boy, for whom Morn well might break, and April bloom.’

“Among the Argives it was Linus. With the Arcadians it was Scephrus. In Phrygia it was Lityrses. On the shore of the Black Sea it was Bormus. In the country of the Bithynians it was Hylas. At Pelusium it was Maneros. And in Syria it was Adonis. The untimely death of these beautiful boys, carried off in their morning of life, was yearly bewailed ; their names re-echoing over the plains, the fountains, and among the hills. It is obvious that these cannot have been real persons, whose death excited a sympathy so general, so recurrent." Now compare (Sonnet 104) :—

"For fear of which, hear this thou age unbred,
Ere you were born, was beauty's summer dead."

This is addressed to us—Posterity. Again compare (Sonnet 97) :—

"How like a winter hath my absence been

Compare Sonnets 73, 63, 67; equally addressed to Dionysus, or Adonis.¹

With regard to Adonis, we must now draw attention to Shakespeare's extraordinary forestalment of modern mythographers and writers upon ancient symbolism in religion. Sir George Cox says, "Tammuz (or Adonis) became the symbol under which the sun, invoked with a thousand names, has been worshipped." Now compare Shakespeare, 53 :—

"What is your substance, whereof are ye made,
That millions of strange shadows on you tend?
Since everyone, hath, everyone, one shade,
And you but one, can every shadow lend.
Describe Adonis and the counterfeit
Is poorly imitated after you."

This is the sun which Adonis and myriads of other solar heroes represented. Directly we begin the first poem or heir of his invention, the poet's Venus and Adonis, we find he is identifying Adonis with the sun. His opening comparison is solar :—

"Even as the sun with purple-colour'd face
Had ta'en his last leave of the weeping morn,
Rose-cheek'd Adonis hied him to the chase."

¹ The myth of Adonis links the legends of Aphrodité with those of Dionysos. Like the Theban wine-god, Adonis is born only on the death of his mother: and the two myths are in one version so far the same that Dionysos like Adonis is placed in a chest which being cast into the sea is carried to Brasiai, where the body of his mother is buried.

It is absurd to take the poem literally, as if merely a peg to hang his poetic proclivities upon, and draw attention to himself. The writer is perfectly acquainted with the entire bearing of the Adonis myth. To prove this is easy enough. The metaphysical or purely fabulous parabolical nature of his treatment of the poem reveals itself in these lines :—

“ By this, the boy that by her side lay kill'd
Was melted like a vapour from her sight,
And in his blood that on the ground lay spill'd,
A purple flower sprung up, chequer'd with white.
Resembling well his pale cheeks, and the blood
Which in round drops upon their whiteness stood.”¹

Thus the great Rosicrucian protagonist, Adonis, is changed into a flower, which we know is the Rose—Venus' own flower, sacred to her, and which she places in her breast :—

“ She bows her head, the new-sprung flower to smell,
Comparing it to her Adonis' breath ;
And says, within her bosom it shall dwell,
Since he himself is reft from her by death :
She crops the stalk, and in the breach appears
Green dropping sap, which she compares to tears.

“ ‘ Poor flower,’ quoth she, ‘ this was thy father's guise,
(Sweet issue of a more sweet-smelling sire),
For every little grief to wet his eyes :
To grow unto himself was his desire,
And so 't is thine ; but know, it is as good
To wither in my breast as in his blood.

“ ‘ Here was thy father's bed, here in my breast ;
Thou art the next of blood, and 't is thy right :
Lo ! in this hollow cradle take thy rest,
My throbbing heart shall rock thee day and night :
There shall not be one minute in an hour
Wherein I will not kiss my sweet love's flower.’ ”

¹ For the story of the Rose springing out of Adonis' blood, see Bion, Idyll i. 66. Pausanias also identifies Adonis with the Rose (v. Eliac ii., vi., cap. 24, section 5, ed. Schubart).

But that there shall be no loophole left for the critics to doubt this, consider this Sonnet :—

LIV.

“O, how much more doth beauty beauteous seem,
 By that sweet ornament that truth doth give !
 The rose looks fair, but fairer we it deem,
 For that sweet odour, which doth in it live.
 The canker-blooms have full as deep a dye,
 As the perfumed tincture of the roses,
 Hang on such thorns, and play as wantonly,
 When summer's breath their mask'd bud discloses :
 But, for their virtue only is their show,
 They live unwood'd, and unrespected fade ;
 Die to themselves. Sweet roses do not so ;
 Of their sweet deaths, are sweetest odours made :
 And so of you, beauteous and lovely youth.
 When that shall fade my verse distils your truth.”

We see here that this Rose is a “beauteous and lovely youth,” Adonis, who is Truth at the same time. For he is the Logos of the Sun “crucified in the Heavens at the vernal equinox.” (Godfrey Higgins.) Now mark the last line, and, particularly, the words :—

“My verse distils your truth.”

Compare Sonnet 5 :—

“Then were not Summer's distillation left
 A liquid prisoner pent in walls of glass.”

So that we have in these last lines a hint to Adonis as Summer's distillation, or Rose-Water pent in Crystal, which we find a common expression among the Rosicrucians. For example, Thomas Vaughan, a famous member of the mystic Brotherhood, writes :—

“In regard of the ashes of the vegetables, although their weaker exterior elements expire by violence of the fire, yet their earth cannot be destroyed, but is vitrified. The fusion and transparency of this substance is occasioned by the Radicall moysture, or seminal water of the compound. This water resists the fury of the fire, and cannot possibly be vanquished. ‘In hac Aquâ (Crystal) Rosa latet in hième.’ These two principals are never separated; for Nature proceeds not so far in her dissolutions. When Death hath done her worst, there is an union between these two, and out of them shall God raise us at the last day, and restore us to a spiritual constitution.”

Not only is Vaughan’s idea the entire substance of our argument, but it is evident Shakespeare borrows this simile from the rose pent up in the crystal. “Walls of glass” can have but this reference, and the entire Sonnet deals with this spiritual rebirth of the flower, out of the seed of its essence, in Spring and Summer. Sidney employs this simile of Rose-Water in his “Arcadia.” The philosophic expression of Vaughan’s theory, is what in scientific parlance is termed, the conservation of energy, or the indestructibility of matter.

We find Sir Philip Sidney, in his “Arcadia,” using the same language to the same effect. It is evident this is a symbol of immortality, of resurrection, of conservation for the sake of rebirth.

“Have you ever seen a pure Rosewater kept in a crystal glass? How fine it looks? How sweet it smells while that beautiful glass imprisons it? Break the prison and let the water take his own course, doth it not embrace dust and lose all its former sweetness and fairness? Truly so are we if we have not the stay rather than the restraint of crystalline marriage.”

“Crystal,” writes Hargreave Jennings, “is a hard transparent stone composed of simple plates, giving fire with steel, not fermenting with acid menstrua, calcining in a strong fire, of a regular angular figure, supposed by some to be formed of dew coagulated with nitre.” (“Rosicrucians,” vol. i., p. 180) “But the Jewel of the Rosicrucians was formed of a transparent red-stone, with a red cross on one side and a red rose on the other—thus it is a crucified rose.” (Ibid., vol. ii., p. 65) We thus see that this is typical of Adonis crucified in the Heavens at the vernal equinox. Nay, more, it is plain that this connection of Dew with the Rose, and therefore with Adonis, is purely historical. For in the Vishnu Purana Wilson (514) relates the story of Procris in another form:—"The dew becomes visible only when the blackness of the night is dispelled, and the same sun is reflected in the thousands of sparkling drops; but the language of the Purana is in singular accordance with the phraseology in which Roman Catholic writers delight to speak of nuns as the brides of Christ." (Cox's "Myth. of Aryans," ii., 139). Do we not here receive a hint as to the "crystalline marriage" of Sir Philip Sidney and Vaughan's resurrection (quoted), with this "dewy question"? Can we not further see that the crucified Rose, mounted on a Calvary, has at bottom the same meaning as the crucifixion of Christ, who was the Logos, the "corner stone," the "philosopher's stone" of the Temple? In the sonnets quoted we find the poet connecting the Rose with Truth as sacrificed—as Winter—as promise of rebirth—as fresh Summer. All this falls in with the idea presented us by the Jewel emblem of the Rosicrucians. Christ was the Light of the world—the Divine Lux, after more of which every true Mason is searching. But the Sun is the Light of the world—it dies in winter apparently, to be reborn in the summer. Directly we go deeper into this question we find corroborating facts. This is what Hargreave Jennings writes:—"In regard to the singular name of the Rosicrucians, it may be here stated that the Chemists, according to their arcana, derive the Dew from the Latin Ros, and in the figure of a cross (+) they trace the three letters which compose the word Lux, Light. Mosheim is positive as to the accuracy of his information." ("The Rosicrucians, their Rites and Mysteries" p. 101, vol. i., 3rd edition).

The reader will remember, in Bacon's "New Atlantis," "the pillar and Cross of Light, which brake up and cast itself abroad, as it were, into a firmament of many stars; and which also vanished soon after, and there was nothing left to be seen but a small ark or chest of cedar, dry, and not wet at all with water, though it swam ; and in the fore-end of it, which was towards him, grew a small green branch of palm."

Now there is in this "pillar and cross of light" an unmistakable resemblance to the emblem of the Rosicrucians, the crucified glory or Light, which, as the Rose is disguise for Adonis, the Sun or Logos, on the cross. Is there not also, in the breaking "up of this cross and casting itself abroad into a firmament of many stars," a hint of the spread of the society and the growth of individual talent in its service (as stars), which also vanished soon after. Rosicrucianism produced a firmament of literary stars all over Europe, of whom Fludd and Boehmen stand pre-eminent, but the striking parallel is that the society did vanish soon after Bacon's death in 1630, in exactly the way he describes it. But the fame of the fraternity still outlives the shipwrecks of time, and floats, like the "cedar chest," upon the waters of oblivion, immortal ! Now there can be no doubt, to those who understand these subjects, that the green branch of palm in the fore-end of the chest is introduced by Bacon to typify immortality and rebirth. The palm tree is the Phoenix dactylifera, with which the fable of the fabulous bird, the Phoenix, is most closely associated, being supposed to build its nest upon a palm tree. But the curious growth of the Phoenix dactylifera explains, we think, the origin of the fable. It throws out branches every year from the centre, and the old ones dying go to form the bark of the tree in a remarkable way, suggesting continual death and rebirth.

Upon three steles in the Berlin Museum, the sacred Tree or Tree of Life is represented by the date palm—Phoenix dactylifera.

Among the Jews, the date palm would seem to have had a certain typical signification ; it was largely introduced in the decorations of Solomon's temple, being represented on the walls along with the cherubim, and also on the furniture and vessels of the temple (1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35 ; vii. 36).

In the Song of Solomon, which theologians regard as significant of the love of the Church for Christ, the Spouse of the Church is spoken of as the palm tree. "I said, I will go up to the palm tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof" (Solomon, Song vii. 8).

The palm tree is also in Scripture a favourite simile for the righteous, who are said to flourish like the palm tree (Psalm xcii. 12).

The Tree of Life mentioned in the second chapter of Genesis v. 9, has always been understood as the palm tree—the date palm—Phoenix dactylifera.

In the last chapter of the Apocalypse there is a reference to the palm tree, as the Tree of Life in the heavenly Jerusalem. St John thus describes the water of life and the Tree of Life: "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations" (Rev. xxii. 1, 2).

The palm tree was popularly believed to put forth a shoot every month, and hence became, at the close of the year, a symbol of it; and was the origin of the Christmas tree, so popular with the Germans, but derived originally from Egypt. It is well known the leaves of the palm were at one time used for writing on (Pliny). In Christian symbolism, the Tree of Life is the date palm, and souls are represented, commonly, as doves. On one of these palm trees is very commonly perched a phoenix with a glory of seven rays. There is a good example of this in the Church of the SS. Cosma and Damiano; the phoenix with the glory symbolises the resurrection to eternal life, and is placed on the palm tree as the symbolical support of that life.

The phoenix was, in this sense, a very ancient mythical symbol. Dante alludes to it, "Inferno," xxiv., 106-8—

"Così per li gran savi si confessa,
Che la Fenice muore e poi rinasce,
Quando al cinquecentesimo anno appressa."

Ovid ("Metamorphoses," lib. xv. v. 392 et seq.) associates this fabulous bird with the palm tree, as preparing its funeral nest among the branches, "tremulæque cacumine palmæ," from whence, on its death, another little phoenix rises up.

It is a doubtful point whether the tree, Phœnix dactylifera, gave name to the bird, or the mythical bird to the tree; possibly the well known fact that, when an aged female palm tree was burnt down to the roots, a new tree sprang up amid the ashes of the old one, may have been the origin of the fable. (See C. Plinii, "Secundi Naturalis Historiæ," lib. xiii., c. 9.)

In Chester's "Love's Martyr" (published 1601), in which Shakespeare's supposed poem, the Phoenix and Turtle is to be found, we find Ben Jonson contributing a poem, in which we find the idea of crystal repeated:—

"Judgement (adorned with Learning)
Doth shine in her discerning,
Cleare as a naked vestall
Closde in an orbe of Christall."—BEN JONSON.

In Bacon's "Natural History," we find him giving us an experiment how to make crystal (Century IV. Experiment 364), and in the next experiment, 365 (the number of days in the year), telling us how to preserve, or conserve Roses! It is plain that the thought of the crystal, calls up the thought of the Rose, and shows intimacy with the crystal and Rose-water idea.

This comparison of the Rose, begins with the first sonnet, in a sense thoroughly in keeping, with a depth of creation, that is to conserve for immortality. The rose is ever before the poet's mind's eye:—

"From fairest creatures we deaire increase
That thereby beauties Rose might never die."

This Rose is to be as immortal as the crucified Rose, and herein we can see, that the only way such immortality can be attained, is by just this sacrifice of crucifixion. To preserve the Rose, or the rose-water, during the Winter, it must be first imprisoned in the crystal.

Compare—

“ Why should poore beautie indirectly seeke
Roses of Shadow, since his Rose is true ? ”

“ Then were not summer's distillation left
A liquid prisoner pent in walls of glass,
Beauties effect with beautie were bereft,
Nor it nor no remembrance what it was.
But flowers distill'd, though they with winter meet,
Leese but their show, their substance still lives sweet.”

This is a most unmistakable application of Sir Philip Sidney's Rosewater, kept in a crystal glass, or Vaughan's “ In hac Aquâ (Crystal) Rosa latet in hieme. ”

“ Then let not winter's ragged hand deface
In thee thy summer ere thou be distill'd :
Make sweet some vial ; treasure thou some place
With beauties treasure ere it be self kill'd.”

How is it Masonry terminates with the grade of Rose Cross (Rose-Croix), the Paradise of Dante, and, indeed, the entire Divine Comedy terminates with the Great Rose ? Dante employs this emblem of the Rose to depict the Virgin :—

“ Perchè la faccia mia sì t'innamora,
Chè tu non ti rivolgi al bel giardino,
Che sotto i raggi di Cristo s'infiora,
Quivi è la rosa in che'l verbo divino,
Carne si fece.”

The Divine Word is the Logos, through which everything was created. What does the Rose mean ? It means secrecy—it means Love through which everything is created. And as Crucified Rose, it means Crucified Love or Logos, Light and truth—immortality—the secret of immortality !

“ There is a Silver Rose, called Tamara Pua, in the Paradise of the Brahmans. ‘ This Paradise is a garden in heaven, to which celestial spirits are first admitted on their ascent from the terrestrial sphere. The Rose contains the images of two women, as bright and fair as a pearl ; but these two are only one, though appearing as if distinct according to the medium, celestial or terrestrial, through which they are viewed. In the first aspect she is called the Lady of the Mouth, in the other, the Lady of the Tongue, or the Spirit of Tongues. In the centre of this Silver Rose, God has his permanent residence."

"A correspondence will be readily recognised between this divine woman or virgin—two and yet one, who seems to typify the Logos, the Spirit of Wisdom, and the Spirit of Truth—and the two-edged sword of the Spirit in the Apocalypse, the Sapientia quæ ex ore Altissimi prodiit, as it is called in the sublime Advent antiphon of the Latin Church. The mystical Rose in the centre of the allegorical garden is continually met with in legend. Buddha is said to have been crucified for robbing a garden of a flower, and after a common fashion of mythology, the divine Avatar of the Indians is henceforth identified with the object for which he suffered, and he becomes himself 'a flower, a Rose, a Padma, Lotus, or Lily.' Thus he is the Rose crucified, and we must look to the far East for the origin of the Rosicrucian emblem. According to Godfrey Higgins, this is 'the Rose of Isuren, of Tamul, and of Sharon, crucified for the salvation of men—crucified,' he continues, 'in the heavens at the vernal equinox.'" (Waite's "Real Hist. of Rosicrucians," Introduction, page 11.)

The Rose is also the emblem of Bacchus or Dionysus, whom the best authorities identify with Adonis:—

"Adonis, be it observed, is with the Hymn-writer only another name for Dionysos, and so he is Polyonymos, the many-named, 'the best of heavenly beings,' as Zagreus and Iao are 'the highest of gods.' So Adonis is Eubouleus, the Wise-counselling, and Dikeros, the Two-horned, 'nourisher of all,' i.e., vital power of the world, 'male and female;' or, as Shelley says, 'a sexless thing it seemed,' in fact the 'two-natured Iakchos.' Ever fresh and vigorous, he is, like Dionysos, both solar and kosmogonic.

"Adonis, ever flourishing and bright;
At stated periods doom'd to set and rise

With splendid lamp, the glory of the skies.
 'Tis thine to sink in Tartarus profound,
 And shine again thro' heaven's illustrious round.'"
 —Taylor. (Brown's "Great Dionysiak Myth.," vol. i. p. 66.)

Note that he is androgynous, or, as Shelly writes, "a sexless thing it seemed," which finds its complete reproduction in the Sonnets, under the title of Master-Mistress, separate yet identical, —Light and Darkness, Heaven and Hell, Summer and Winter, Idea and Form, Logos and Concealment. It is the marriage of these two, which constitutes Creation, and whose offspring is the reappearance of the Light or Logos—Revelation—the child or son, in which we at once see the mystery of the Trinity pre-figured. The father contemplates his alter Ego, which is his Mind, crucified in the act of creation, that is concealed (as meaning or archetypal ideas or principles) in the material or form, which is feminine. But this is Plato's simile to exemplify Creation Divine or poetic, i.e., Marriage for the sake of Divine offspring:—

"A woman's face with nature's own hand painted,
 Hast thou, the Master-Mistress of my passion,
 A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
 With shifting change, as is false women's fashion ;
 An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling :
Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth ;
 A man in you, all hues in his controlling,
 Which steals men's eyes, and women's souls amazeth.
 And for a woman wert thou first created ;
 Till nature as she wrought thee, fell a doting,
 And by addition me of thee defeated,
 By adding one thing to my purpose nothing.
 But since she prick't thee out for women's pleasure,
 Mine be thy love, and thy love's use their treasure."

"A man in you," concealed "in you," identified with "you" in this "union in partition"¹ of the plays—light concealed in darkness!

¹ "So they lov'd, as love in twain
 Had the essence but in one ;
 Two distincts, division none :
 Number there in love was slain."

—Phoenix and Turtle.

Read the opening of the Sonnets. The argument is marriage for the sake of immortality,—true immortality,—copy (in the second degree), of divine truths concealed for a planned revelation through time, that is the secret of the poems. They contain the creative principles of the plays—are the new life of the poet's art. This is written so "within and without," so plainly, that we hardly know how to deal with it, for it is everywhere. The poet is a god. He divides his art into an external and an internal for posterity to discover and reveal. The unrevealed side (to him) is darkness, winter—the icy image of death and sleep. We know that the Winter's Tale embraces this creative separation under the summer and winter myth of Persephone and Deméter (or Proserpine and Ceres) taking the "Mysteries of Eleusis" as key centre. Until Perdita is found this Art is but winter; its summer (Adonis), "the pleasure of the fleeting year" crucified as the Rose (his emblem), and therefore the "age unbred" is told that "beauty's summer" was dead or sacrificed as Love's Martyr:—

"For fear of which, hear this, thou age unbred,— Ere you were born, was beauty's summer dead."

"But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou owest;
Nor shall Death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou growest:
So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee."

"For as the sun is daily new and old,
So is my love still telling what is told."

The Rose crucified is, we believe, nothing short of crucified Light or glory. For as Hargreave Jennings shows us, Lux is the Logos by whom all things were made, and the Logos is Rasit. We know that the Red Rose sprang from the blood of Adonis. Thus from his sacrifice, who, as the sun, is light, we have the idea, in the crucified Rose, of the Saviour's martyrdom. Pegasus, the winged steed of the muses, springs from the blood of Medusa, and from the stroke of the hoof of Pegasus arose the fountain of Hippocrene. This idea, which is connected with the winged chariot of Phædrus, finds its reproduction in the Sonnets. But we have direct proof of this association of Light or Logos with the crucified Rose. Khunrath, an adept of the order, in his "Amphitheatrum Sapientiæ Eternæ," gives us in his fifth pantacle a Rose of Light, in whose centre there is a human form extending its arms in the form of a cross, which puts the matter out of further doubt. In short, the crucified Rose is the Christian legend, extracted from Nature (and as universal as Nature), applied symbolically to indicate immortality, or the secret of the creation of the universe,—that is the Logos, or Light, concealed in darkness,—Truth as the Thought of God, hidden yet made manifest, in the works of the creation. This Truth is the archetypal Mind, or meaning of the world. It is the creative idea, or ideas, which are clothed in Nature's art, as a truth may be concealed in a fable, myth, or allegory. As the fly in the amber or crystal, so is Truth open yet secret, concealed and hidden, according to our capacities. It is sacrificed in the making, to be revealed in the unmaking or rebirth. This is the secret of the poems commonly called Shakespeare's.

We have abundant proof that the Rose is intended to represent the sun or light. "In the Paradise of Danté we find, however, the emblem whose history we are tracing, placed, and assuredly not without reason, in the supreme, central heaven amidst the intolerable manifestation of the Uncreated Light, the Shecinah of Rabbinical theosophy, the chosen habitation of God—'a sacred Rose and Flower of Light, brighter than a million suns, immaculate, inaccessible, vast, fiery with magnificence, and surrounding God as if with a million veils. This symbolic Rose is as common a hierogram throughout the vast temples and palaces of the Ancient East as it is in the immense ruins of Central America.' " (Waite's "Real Hist. Rosicrucians," Introduction, 17).

The Rose plays a double symbolic part, according as we take it physically or metaphysically. In the former sense it is the secret flower of Venus, the emblem of the mysteries of love,—the sign of creation in a human sense. In the latter sense, it is creation in the Divine (crucified) meaning. In the solar meaning it is the crucifixion of the sun at the vernal equinox. Thus we see what a vast meaning it embraces. If the poet's art has two complete sides (which is plain to those who can read the Sonnets), they must be in opposition. Darkness is the reversed side of Light. Winter is the opposite to Summer, Day to Night, Heaven to Hell, Male to Female, Love to Hate, Life to Death. With this key, which is a paradox of identity and separation, a "union in partition," we can at once unlock many mysteries of the poems, and particularly of that strange one, the Phoenix and Turtle,—which promises a rebirth in the plainest language. The art of the plays and poems entitled Shakespeare's is as profound, as full a circle, as all living and complete, as Nature itself. It is a little Nature, and its creative God was Francis Bacon.

We find Bacon writing :—"It is reported by some, that the herb called Rosa Solis (whereof they make strong waters) will at the Noonday, when the sun shineth hot and bright, have a great dew upon it. And therefore that the right name is *Ros Solis*¹ (or dew of the sun), which they impute to a delight and sympathy that it hath with the sun." ("Nat. Hist. Cent.," v. 103.)

"Some of the ancients, and likewise divers of the modern writers, that have laboured in Natural Magick, have noted a sympathy between the Sun, Moon, and some principal stars, and certain herbs and plants. And so they have denominated some herbs, Solar and some Lunar. It is manifest, that there are some flowers that have respect to the sun in two kinds, the one by opening and shutting, and the other by bowing and inclining the head. For Marygolds, Tulippas, Pimpernels, and indeed most flowers do open or spread their leaves abroad when the sun

¹ There has indeed been spread abroad, as well in books as in common rumour, the story of a tree in one of the Tercera or Canary Isles (I do not well remember which) which is constantly dripping; so as to some extent to supply the inhabitants with water. And Paracelsus says that the herb called Ros Solis is at noon and under a burning sun filled with dew, while all the other herbs round it are dry.—(Natural History.)

shineth serene and fair : and again (in some part) close them, or gather them inward, either toward night, or when the Sky is overcast.

“ For the bowing and inclining of the head, it is found in the great flower of the Sun, in Marygolds,” &c., &c.

“ The Rossi—or Rosy—crucians’ ideas, concerning the emblematical red cross and red rose, probably came from the fable of Adonis, who was the sun, whom we have seen so often crucified—being changed into a red rose by Venus.” (See Drummond, “ Origines,” vol. iii. p. 121.) “ Rus (which is Ras in Chaldee) in Irish signifies ‘ tree,’ ‘ knowledge,’ ‘ science,’ ‘ magic,’ ‘ power.’ This is the Hebrew Ras.” (Hargreave Jennings’ “ Rosicrucians,” vol. ii. p. 65.)

A French writer (anonymous) thus expresses himself:—“ Enfin la Maçonnerie, dont le centre était l’Angleterre, après avoir triomphé des terreurs frivoles d’Elizabeth et du parlement, après avoir obtenu la protection signalée d’Edouard III. et de Henry VI., qui avaient voulu la connaître, vit le nombre de ses membres s’accroître avec les lumières, quand l’Europe eut reçu l’impulsion vigoureuse du 16^e siècle. Elle même propagea toutes les sciences et les enseigna sous la forme symbolique, jusqu’à ce que par de plus grands progrès cette forme fût devenue inutile. Comment se refuser à admettre ce que j’avance, si l’on jette les yeux sur toutes les allusions au manteau blanc, à la croix rouge, au temple de Salomon, que renferment la Nouvelle Atlantis de Bacon, la Noce chymique, et autres ouvrages du même temps, si justement attribués à la compagnie des Rose-croix.” (La Maçonnerie, “ Poème en trois Chants,” 1820.)

The Rose is the secret of this Art called Shakespeare’s, for until the World awakes to realize the idea that this art is Christianity dramatized, and that it contains a planned revelation through time, it will comprehend nothing but folly in all this. When we use the expression “ Christianity,” we mean the real nature meaning of the divine myth. We mean the Divine Mind or Logos hidden in this art, as orderly philosophical construction underlying its appearance. The Logos from the earliest times, comprehends the foundation of the world—it is simply the Wisdom, or Divine Mind underlying creation—as Truth. The act of creation is its crucifixion. For it is buried in the Art of Nature,¹ in order to rise again through us as we identify ourselves with it. The Spirit of God is the spirit of truth, and it is in Nature, half-hidden, half-concealed, as it is in its divine copy, Bacon's plays.—

“For words like Nature half conceal,
And half reveal the soul within.”

We find in the plays and poems a mysterious allusion to fire, which it is impossible to reconcile with the simple external meaning of the text. For example (Sonnet 144):—

“The truth shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.”

In the Winter's Tale we find Leontes saying:—

“Leontes. Say, that she were gone,
Given to the fire, a moiety of my rest
Might come to me again.”

This is very striking and curious. What is the “moiety” or half, that might come to Leontes again?

A writer, last century, remarks of the Rosicrucians:—“They all maintain that the dissolution of bodies by the power of fire, is the only way by which men can arrive at true wisdom, and come to discern the first principles of things. They all acknowledge a certain analogy and harmony between the powers of nature and the doctrines of religion, and believe that the Deity governs the kingdom of grace by the same laws with which he rules the kingdom of nature: and hence they are led to use chemical denominations to express the truths of religion.”

Which, us'd, lives thy executor to be.”

(Sonnet iv.)

Bacon writes :—

“Therefore this kindling or catching Fire, Heraclitus called peace ; because it composed nature and made her one ; but generation he called war, because it multiplied and made her many.” (Bacon’s “Works,” vol. v., p. 473, Spedding.)

In All’s Well that Ends Well, we have a curious plot founded upon Love and Hate. Helena is married to Bertram against his desire. Then they are separated, and the play turns upon their reconciliation. We find Bertram is attended by one called Parolles, a name which means Words. He is an evil instrument of separation, persuading Bertram to go to the wars—and is a liar. We cannot be mistaken in suspecting that he is an emblem of Words and their false connotations.¹ The first character who detects and exposes him is Le Feu, a name which translated is simply fire ! We see that Bertram is separate yet identical with Helena (that is, an “union in partition”), and that Parolles (or words—false words) is the separating medium. There is, in the fact of Bertram’s Hate, and Helena’s Love, a principle of Strife and Friendship, or Mars and Venus, which we re-find in the Sonnets. Bertram is associated with Mars as soldier. Helena exchanges rôle with Diana, whose name recalls her classical prototype, who was the great reconciler of separated things—Nature. Very few will believe this, but we are certain of it. The union of Contraries is a favourite system of plot construction in the plays. The poem of Venus and Adonis is one of Love on one side—Hate on the other. Romeo and Juliet is a play in which Love is crossed by family Hate. The poems are philosophically, the expression of a youth, who is Love and Light, at cross-purposes with a woman who is Hate—and Darkness.

Take Sonnet 45 :—

“The other two, slight air and purging fire,
The first my thought, the other my desire.”

¹ “It seems to me that Pygmalion’s frenzy is a good emblem or portraiture of this vanity ; for words are but the images of matter, and except they have life of reason and invention to fall in love with them is all one as to fall in love with a picture.”—(“Advancement of Learning.”)

Or consider this with regard to study :—

“ Biron. So study evermore is overshot,
 While it doth study to have what it would,
 It doth forget to do the thing it should :
 And when it hath the thing it hunteth most,
 'T is won as towns with fire ; so won, so lost.”

Compare Sonnet 144 :—

“ The truth shall I ne'er know but live in doubt,
 Till my bad angel fire my good one out.”

Thomas Taylor tells us in his notes upon Plato's Cratylus, that air is a symbol of soul or spirit, and fire is an image of intellect.

“ Separate the earth from the fire, the subtle from the gross very carefully and with ingenuity. It ascends from the earth into heaven, then again descends into the earth, and receives the force of above and below.” (“ Smaragdine Tablet of Hermes.”)

CHAPTER V.

FREEMASONRY.

“Non canimus surdis respondent omnia sylvæ.”—Virg., Ecl. x. 3.
(We sing not to dull ears; the woods re-echo to each sound.)

It is very curious to find St Albans associated with the origin or first importation into England, in the third century, of Freemasonry, because, whether Bacon was a Rosicrucian or not, no Mason can read the “New Atlantis,” with its Solomon’s Temple,¹ College of the Six Day, and entire spirit of brotherly love, without being convinced he was a member (if no more) of the brotherhood. We cannot get over the fact, that a profound student of the origins of Freemasonry, like Nicolai, thought he was connected with the resuscitation of the Society in its modern form, which appears to have taken place about the beginning or middle of the seventeenth century. Therefore, it is a striking and extraordinary coincidence, or rather a hint for us to ponder over, that St Alban’s Abbey presents, with its Protomartyrs’ history, the cradle, if not the birthplace, of Masonry in England. Nay, more, the actual stones of Gorhambury House (called very curiously the Temple) were taken, together with the lime, from the ruins of the Abbey itself! So that this house (built 1571), in which Bacon’s youthful genius was nourished, to which he always returned, and which until 1603 he retained, was constructed out of the stones which the “Hond Masons” of King Offa erected to the memory of the good St Alban. Can it be possible that the history of this newly built house could have been unknown to Bacon; nay, did he not see the house growing up under his own eyes? Bacon was born in 1560-1561;—the new House completed in 1571.

Though born at York Place, in the Strand, yet he was often enough at Gorhambury to realise the fact that a species of sacrilege was being perpetrated—the venerable Abbey robbed (although, it is true, it was quite a ruin) to erect his father's mansion. The stones themselves were crying out in witness thereof—those stones (with their mysterious Mason's-marks) were round him, and it is hardly possible he could have been indifferent to their dumb history. We find the town arms of St Albans to be the cross of St Andrew, and we think it is highly probable that the English Masonry was imported first from Scotland. At any rate it will be interesting to Masons, for me to give them a few extracts, as to the early importance of St Albans, and its Abbey, from a Masonic point of view. It is our belief that Bacon was associated early in a movement to revivify or resuscitate Freemasonry throughout Europe. Whether a Rosicrucian or no matters little. The Templars were the successors of the Knights of the Round Table, and the Rosicrucians appear to have been again affiliated with the Templars. The names change, the rites alter, the philosophy may be different, but the principles remain affiliating all these societies to Masonry, which is, in our judgment, the oral method of transmission of which Bacon hints in his works. We now proceed to give a few quotations, to establish the early associations of the Abbey with the craft, and which must have been familiar enough to the ubiquitous and profound mind of Bacon.

“The original church built by King Offa in the eighth century was erected by him and the ‘Hond Masons’ to the memory of St Alban, and that according to the Guild legends St Alban himself was intimately associated with the Masons. In these he is claimed as the patron of Freemasons. The earliest mention of St Alban in connection with masonry is to be found in the Prose Constitutions, among MSS. of the British Museum, of date 1425. There we read—

* “ ‘And St Alban loved well Masons, and he gave them first their charges and manners first in England, and he ordained convenient times to pay for the travail.’

“This tradition is repeated and amplified in numerous other Guild legends. In the Lansdowne MS., A.D. 1560, we find these words :—

“ ‘St Alban was a worthy Knight and Steward of the King, his household, and had government of his realm, and also of the making of the walls of the said town, and he loved well masons, and cherished them much, and made their pay right good, for he gave them 3 and vid. a week and iiid. ; before that time all the land a mason took but one penny a day and his meat, till St Alban mended it, and he gave them a charter of the King and his “Councell,” for to hold a general assembly, and gave it to name assembly.’

“In the Antiquity MS., of date 1686, is this further statement—

“ ‘And he gott them a charter from the King and his “Councell,” to hold a general “Councell,” and gave itt to name “Assemblie,” thereat he was himself, and did help to make Masons and gave them charges as you shall heare afterwards.’

“The Prince of Wales, the Grand Master of the Order, and the Duke of Albany were among the subscribers to the pulpit, which was presented and unveiled with due ceremony on the 16th of July 1883, by the Provincial Grand Master of Hertfordshire, Brother T. F. Halsey, M.P. The sermon upon the occasion was preached by the Grand Chaplain of England, the Rev. W. Oswald Thompson, M.A., Vicar of Hemel Hempstead.” (“Guide, Mason.”)

The Abbey is particularly interesting to those who believe that Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare, for it is here we find the tomb of the “Good Duke Humphrey,” or Duke of Gloucester, and it was here that the story repeated in the second part of Henry the Sixth was inscribed.

“There was a Latin inscription to the memory of the ‘Good

Duke Humphrey,' on the east wall (now removed) of the aisle written by a master of the Grammar School in the seventeenth century. It contained an allusion to a religious fraud, practised by a man who pretended he had been miraculously restored to sight at the shrine of St Alban, and said to have been exposed by Duke Humphrey. Shakespeare describes the legend in the second part of Henry the Sixth, act the second, the scene being laid at St Albans—'Enter a townsman of St Albans, crying, "A miracle!"'" ("Guide, Mason.")

It seems only natural that Bacon should have introduced this story in connection with the Duke in his play, but very unnatural for Shakespeare, a stranger, to bring in a curious episode of this sort. But there is plenty of subtle evidence of this kind.

"Enter a Townsman of St Alban's, crying 'A miracle!'

Glou. What means this noise?
Fellow, what miracle dost thou proclaim?
Towns. A miracle! a miracle!
Suf. Come to the king and tell him what miracle.
Towns. Forsooth, a blind man at Saint Alban's shrine,
Within this half-hour hath received his sight;
A man that ne'er saw in his life before.
King. Now, God be praised, that to believing souls Gives light in darkness, comfort in despair!"

How well acquainted the author is with the history of the Abbey—of its foundation, around the shrine of St Alban, which was supposed to work miracles. How lovingly he lingers around it!

"Queen. Tell me, good fellow, camest thou here by chance,
Or of devotion, to this holy shrine?
Simp. God knows, of pure devotion: being call'd
A hundred times and oftener, in my sleep
By good St Alban; who said, 'Simpcox, come,
Come, offer at my shrine, and I will help thee.'"

If Shakespeare wrote the plays, he must have been very well acquainted with the Abbey and its history, and purposely have studied them from the guide books of the period. Probably he ran down from Saturday to Monday on the "Wonder" coach, and took notes. How familiar the author is with this Hertfordshire! He makes Salisbury say (Henry VI., 2d part, sc. ii., act ii.)—

“But William of Hatfield died without an heir.”

Hatfield is about five miles from St Albans. The name comes readily enough to Bacon's pen.

Alexander Lawrie (Sir George Brewer), in his “History of Freemasonry” (published 1804, Edinburgh), writes:—

“It was probably about this time, also, that Freemasonry was introduced into England; but whether the English received it from the Scotch masons at Kilwinning, or from other brethren who had arrived from the Continent, there is no method of determining. The fraternity in England, however, maintain that St Alban, the Proto-Martyr, was the first who brought masonry to Britain;¹ that the brethren received a charter from King Athelstane, and that his brother Edwin summoned all the lodges to meet at York, which formed the first Grand Lodge of England.”²

With regard to Scotland, all the continental societies seem inclined to associate it with the origins of the craft. It is a trifle worthy of note that the arms of St Albans are a St Andrew's Cross.

Edward the Sixth by a charter dated the 12th of May 1553, ordained that—

“The late monastery of St Albans shall be called the parish church of the borough, for all the inhabitants within the late parish or chapelry of St Andrew,' and George Wetherall, clerk, was appointed first rector of the Church of St Alban, for the term of his natural life. Upon this charter being granted, a coat of arms was given to the borough—Azure, a saltire Or.

“A new charter, confirming the charter of Edward the Sixth, was granted by Queen Mary, dated the 10th of December 1553; and Queen Elizabeth, in a charter dated the 7th of February

¹ About the end of the third century.

1559-60, confirmed both the former charters. On the 24th March 1569-70, the queen granted another charter at Gorham-bury, upon the petition of Sir Nicholas Bacon, knight, lord keeper." ("Guide, Mason.")

Curious coincidence, we find a St Andrew's Cross to be the arms of Johann Valentin, St Andreas (or St Andrew), who is supposed to be the founder of the Rosicrucians, but who, at any rate, was the putter out of the famous "Fama Fraternitatis, or Universal Reformation addressed to the learned in Europe," 1614! This is what Mr Waite writes ("Real History of the Rosicrucians") :—

"The 'Chymical Marriage' contains the following passage :— 'Hereupon I prepared myself for the way, put on my white linnen coat, girded my loyns, with a blood-red ribbon bound cross-ways over my shoulder : In my hat I stuck four roses.' Elsewhere, he describes himself as a 'brother of the Red-Rosie Cross,' and a 'Knight of the Golden Stone'—equus aurei lapidas.

"Now, the armorial bearings of the family of Andreas contain a St Andrew's Cross with four roses, one in each of its angles, which interesting piece of internal evidence indicates the authorship of this romance independently of the autobiographical statement, and points irresistibly, it is said, to the conclusion that the founder of the Rose-Cross Society was the man whose heraldic device was also the Rose and Cross."

From this fact De Quincey concludes that Andrea was the real author. Now, although we know the emblem of the Rosicrucians was not a St Andrew's Cross, yet it seems possible he adopted his arms from the passage quoted above in "The Chymical Marriage." Were the arms of Andrea and of his family always a St Andrew's Cross?¹ Can anyone throw light upon these matters? It seems rather suspicious to find a native of Wirtemberg, in the early part of the seventeenth century, bearing the name Andreas or Andrew, and at the same time St Andrew's arms—taking us to Scotland, where particularly the Templars, who were the true predecessors of Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry, are to be found so abundantly.¹ But here is another suspicious fact. De Quincey maintains Andreas to have been the author of the "Fama." How is it, then, that the "Universal Reformation" (the first of the three works) "was borrowed from the 'Generale Riforma dell' Universo dai sette Savii della Grecia e da altri Letterati, publicata di ordine di Apollo,' which occurs in the "Ragguagli di Parnasso" of Boccacini, which was published 1612 at Venice, and in 1615 at Milan"? This is the curious part: that this "Universal Reformation" is found to be published in several different countries at the same time. "The earliest edition of these works which I have seen is that of 1614, printed at Cassel, in octavo, which is in the Wolfenbüttel library; but in this the 'Confessio' is wanting. From a passage in this edition, it appears that the 'Fama Fraternitatis' had been received in the Tyrol as early as 1610, in manuscript, as the passage alleges; but the words seem to imply that printed copies were in existence even before 1610. In the year 1615 appeared 'Secretioris Philosophiæ Consideratio à Philippo à Gabella, Philosophiæ studioso, conscripta; et nunc primum unà cum Confessione Fraternitatis Ros. Crucis in lucem edita. Cassellis: excud. G. Wesselius, A. 1615.' In the very same year, at Frankfurt-on-the-Mayne, was printed by John Berner, an edition of all the three works—the 'Confessio' in a German translation. In this year also appeared a Dutch translation of all three, a copy of which is in the Göttingen library."

Italy is the country where, it appears to us, the inception of the borrowed idea commences, at Venice, with Boccacini's work. We here again call notice to the suspicious wanderings of Anthony Bacon upon the Continent for eleven years, not for amusement only, we may be sure. We find him a long time at Venice. He is later on in France, at Bourdeaux, intimate with Montaigne. Was he his brother's propagandist? That a movement of the extent produced by the "Universal Reformation" should have been the freak of a youthful genius, which is De Quincey's argument, is absurd! De Quincey concludes from the passage in the "Chymical Marriage of Father Rosycross" that Andrew was the real author, because his arms are a St Andrew's Cross! There is something curious in this coincidence, but the suspicion left is that he was not the author of the "Fama." For he denied it utterly, and terms himself a sort of spectator in a theatre.

It is Truth (die Alethia) who is speaking: "Planissime nihil cum hac Fraternitate (sc. Ros. Crucis) commune habeo. Nam, cum paullo ante lusum quendam ingeniosorem personatus aliquis in literario foro agere vellet,—nihil mota sum libelis inter se conflictantibus; sed velut in scenâ prodeuntes histriones non sine voluptate spectavi."

The fact that he published two or three pamphlets to allay the excitement, and deny the society, of which he is the supposed vehicle, is proof enough against him. The extract bears the evidence of truth. What are we to think of an author who denies his own works? But the vitality, width, profundity, and real nature of the Rosicrucian body is revealed in many ways. And here is a remarkable fact, which it is very good for us to ponder over again and again. It is this: Rosicrucianism begins its campaign ostensibly on the Continent,—in Italy first, then Germany, then Holland, lastly France, 1623,—but in none of these countries does it take root. The only place where it takes root is in England; and this is, we believe, a strong proof of its origin. This De Quincey himself points out: "And hence it has happened that, whatever numbers there may have been of individual mystics calling themselves Rosicrucians, no collective body of Rosicrucians acting in conjunction, was ever matured and actually established in Germany. In England, the case was different: for there, as I shall show, the order still subsists under another name" ("Works," vol. xvi. p. 404.) So that the country supposed to have produced the author and founder of the society, produces no fruit. But the root and the fruit, are intimately connected—and they are both to be found in England. That Andrea was nothing but a "merry Andrew," or puppet of some others, is writ large. That the noise, stir, and final taking root of the Society, should have emanated from a man who denies and repudiates his own writings is absurd. Or that for fifteen years, a mere pamphlet, or a few manifestoes, should have at periods agitated the learned in Europe, requires no apology. The fact that it produced men like Fludd, Boehmen, and their works, answers the question as to its originality, thoroughness, depth, and reality. The present revival of interest in the subject (which we see manifested in the literature of the age), is, if we follow De Quincey's arguments, the result of a young man of genius' freaks! As if the rooted interest in the Society, which men like Lord Lytton have shown, should be grounded on a myth!

Now, we quite agree with De Quincey, when he says, "that Free-masonry is neither more nor less than Rosicrucianism as modified by those who transplanted it into England." This we think highly probable. It is as well we should reserve the term "modified," because of the existence of Masonry, under other names, or secret societies, and going back centuries, there can be no manner of question or doubt. What are better than written records, are the Masons' own records, the language of their secret marks, of their architecture, of their allegories in leaf and flower, of their own temples. Let anybody in doubt of this, visit (for example), Rosslyn Chapel, Mid-Lothian, within easy distance from Edinburgh. He will there light upon a Masonic Temple, dating from the year 1446 for its inception. Here is the cradle of Scotch Masonry, if not of something deeper still. He will behold pinnacles in pyramid form, buttresses carved with the sunflower, he will see the rose on the keystone of the east window, the stars of Heaven on the roof of the west compartment, with the sun and Creator in the act of blessing. He will behold the Apprentice's pillar, with a history which repeats itself in the lodge. He will see allegories in stone of the Dance of Death, and of many mediæval legends. There are as many as twenty-three masons' signs engraved on the stones. The predominant ornaments are the Fleur-de-Lis, the Rose, and the Sunflower. Upon the roof of the aisles is the engrailed cross of the founders, the St Clairs, once hereditary Grand Masters of Scotch Masonry. It is one of the most beautiful, and exquisite temples, of Masonic, Templar, and Rosicrucian symbolism in the world, associated with wonderful legend and real romance. Beneath the flagstones, lie buried twelve barons of the Rosslyn family, laid all in their armour, as Sir Walter Scott tells us.

One of the family was Sir William St Clair, who was the warrior friend of King Robert Bruce, and Sir James Douglas, and joined the latter on his celebrated expedition to convey the King's heart to the Holy Land. So that they were Templars in the right good old fashioned way of going to their own Jerusalem. John Robison, in his "Proofs of a Conspiracy against all the Religions and Government of Europe, carried on in the Secret Meetings of Free Masons, Illuminati," &c. (1797), writes as follows:—

"When the Order of Knights Templars was abolished by Philip the Fair, and cruelly persecuted, some worthy persons escaped, and took refuge in the Highlands of Scotland, where they concealed themselves in caves. These persons possessed the true secrets of Masonry, which had always been in that Order, having been acquired by the Knights, during their services in the East, from the pilgrims whom they occasionally protected or delivered. The Chevaliers de la Rose-Croix continued to have the same duties as formerly, though robbed of their emoluments. In fine, every true Mason is a Knight Templar."

Now, what really is interesting in Rosslyn Chapel and its neighbourhood, is, that we know Ben Jonson, the friend of Bacon and Shakespeare, made a journey on foot down to Hawthornden, to visit the poet William Drummond, and that he stayed with him three weeks. Hawthornden is but a mile from Rosslyn Chapel. And Kilwinning, though considered the fount of Scotch Masonry, is so connected with the St Clairs of Rosslyn, as to cause us rather to look for the real origins of Masonry in Scotland to the annals of this famous family of Rosslyn. There is no question in our own minds, that the history of Scottish Masonry circles around this centre. And as they were Templars, everything connected with them is interesting. Billings, in his "Baronial Antiquities," remarks—"An authentic history of this remarkable family might throw some light upon the history of Masonry."

CHAPTER VI.

Ἰσὶς ἐγὼ εἶμι πάντα γεγονόσ καὶ ὄν καὶ ἐσομένοσ καὶ τὸ ἐμὸν πέπλοσ οὐδεὶσ τῶν θηγῆτῶν ἀπεκαλύψεν.

HERMETIC AND MASONIC ORIGINS IN THE PLAYS.

To do justice to such a subject as this, would, indeed, require something like the solution of the entire Baconian-Shakespearian question. But we may indicate a few parallels to point out our meaning. And first, as to the locality and direction from which Masonry sprang, viz., Egypt, Chaldæa, and particularly Phœnicia. Can we find any indications in the plays called Shakespeare's, to show us that the same localities are referred to? If Bacon wrote the plays, nothing is so probable, or so certain, that we should find something referring to King Solomon, or to his country, in these plays. For is not Bacon everlastingly quoting Solomon throughout his works, certainly oftener than any other authority? "The glory of God is to conceal a thing, but the glory of the king is to find it out, as if, according to the innocent play of children, the Divine Majesty took delight to hide His works, to the end to have them found out." How many times indeed, does Bacon iterate this in his works, as if to tell us he meant to take a like way, and imitate God, presenting us with an enigma for the ages to solve, and the wisdom of Solomon concealed therein. But what is the "New Atlantis," with its Solomon's House, and its frontispiece of the two pillars (which Hiram of Tyre made of brass, and set up with pomegranate and lily work on the tops, and which were set in the porch of the Temple), but Masonry, from beginning to end, without any aid from John Heydon, to prove it is Rosicrucian. We don't want Heydon's narrative to assist us, because the frontispieces of Bacon's own works tell us exactly what he wants to tell us, and what we want to know.

Perhaps this fact, that the Phœnicians¹ were the first bold navigators who dared to go beyond the pillars of Hercules, to the isles of Britain, and who were at the same time countrymen of King Solomon and Hiram; had a peculiar fascination for Bacon. Perhaps this is why his ship device, and frontispiece with the two pillars of the temple, or of Hercules, arose in his mind. But do not let us be in a hurry, or speculate too rashly. We cannot overestimate the importance of The Tempest as a play throwing light upon the entire cycle of this enchanted art. Because it is first and last, and very clearly relates to a God, in relationship to his own art. The strangest feature in that play, is the bringing in, of the names of Dido and Æneas, of Carthage or Tunis, in connection with the shipwrecked King and his Courtiers. They speak of being at Carthage, at the marriage of Claribel to the King of Tunis. As this is quite outside the play, and without any apparent bearing upon the plays in general, it is either sheer nonsense, or a hint of the profoundest import. Nothing, however, is in this art with a purposeless motive. It is just these strange things which arrest our attention, and which make us wonder what they mean. And therefore we are bound to inquire further into their possible signification.

Certainly the most striking and suggestive Masonic hint offered to us in The Tempest, of its subtle and intimate relationship with Virgil's VIth Book,² and therefore with Æneas, and the Mysteries, is given us in the references to Carthage or Tunis, and the bringing in, in quite an apparently purposeless fashion, of Dido as Widow Dido.

² Mark those pregnant words of Bacon: "That if all arts were lost, they might be recovered from Virgil." Dante has imitated Virgil's VIth Book, his work being "Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven," according to Templar Mysteries and rites.

"Gon. Methinks, our garments are now as fresh as when we put them on first in Afric, at the marriage of the King's fair daughter Claribel to the King of Tunis.

Seb. 'Twas a sweet marriage, and we prosper well in our return.

Adr. Tunis was never graced before with such a paragon to their queen.

Gon. Not since Widow Dido's time.

An. Widow? a pox o' that. How came that widow in? Widow Dido?"

To those who ponder deeply, and who have the faculty of perceiving, by the flawing of a straw or feather, the direction the wind blows, this passage is pregnant with the profoundest significance. First, we have Tunis or Carthage, Dido and Æneas, brought in here in connection with the shipwrecked King and suite, in a play which is the last written, yet which stands first, so that, trifle as this reference is, it is full of direction, and opens a masked door in the otherwise impregnable ramparts of this art. Directly we hear or read of Æneas we are carried back to Virgil's "Æneid." Directly we read of Dido, our minds go back to the foundation of Carthage or Tunis, and in doing so we remember that this is the land of Phœnicia—of the Phœnix—of Cadmus and Harmonia, or Hermione—Libya. Now, if the student will recall Perdita, he will find that she is strangely brought in as coming from Libya, which critics have blanched, or, at any rate, have never attempted to comprehend or explain—seeing that the play is laid in Sicily.

"She came from Libya."—Winter's Tale (Act V. sc. 1).

Here we are at once in touch with Solomon and Hiram, and therefore with Masonry at once. Hiram was King of Tyre.¹ In Pericles we have Tyre again, for Pericles is Prince of Tyre. Nothing could identify Hermione better than this hint. Because ¹ "The Carthaginians were indebted to the Tyrians, not only for their origin, but for their manners, language, customs, laws, religion, and their great application to commerce. They spoke the same language with the Tyrians, and these the same with the Canaanites and Israelites, that is, the Hebrew tongue, or at least a language, which was entirely derived from it."—Rollin, "History of the Carthaginians," vol. i. 89.

Harmonia, or Hermione (mother to Perdita), was the daughter of Venus and Mars, and married the Phœnician Cadmus. But on this point elsewhere. At present it is indeed striking to find the plays attributed to Shakespeare profoundly in touch with the land of Masonry, of Solomon, of Hiram, of Dido; and we expect the ship of Lord Bacon, bound through the pillars of Hercules, comes from Carthage or Tunis—from the marriage of Claribel, and is bound west for the New Atlantis of Prospero's magic island, and this is very much the history of the rise and journey or progress west of Masonry—through the Phœnician navigators who traded beyond the pillars of Hercules to the tin Islands, to Ireland,¹ and Britain, carrying their Masonic lore with them.

Wilkinson, in his "Egypt," writes:—"Strabo, Diodorus, Pliny, and other writers mention certain Islands, discovered by the Phœnicians, which, from the quantity of tin they produced, obtained the name Cassiterides, and are supposed to have been the cluster now known as the Scilly Isles, and to have included part of the coast of Cornwall itself. The secret of their discovery was carefully concealed, says Strabo, from all other persons, and the Phœnician vessels continued to sail from Gade (Cadiz) in quest of this commodity, without it being known whence they obtained it, though many endeavours were made by the Romans at a subsequent period to ascertain the secret, and to have the benefit of this lucrative trade."

"Spain in early times was to the Phœnicians what America at a later period was to the Spaniards; and no one can read the accounts of the immense wealth derived from the mines of that country in the writings of Diodorus and others, without being struck by the relative situation of the Phœnicians and ancient Spaniards, and the followers of Cortez or Pizarro and the inhabitants of Mexico or Peru."² (Wilkinson's "Egypt.")

² Do we not see in this, the origin of Bacon's bringing in in his "New Atlantis," Coys, Tyrambel, Mexico, and Peru?

“The word Kassiteros used by Homer for tin is the same as the Arabic Kasdear, by which the metal is still known in the East, being probably derived from the ancient Phœnicians.”

“The intercourse between the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians necessarily led to an admixture of religious ceremonies, and the roving colonies of Phœnicia (2 Chron. viii. 18) to Carthage in Africa, to new Carthage in Spain, and to the Cassiterides, or Scilly Isles, close to Cornwall (in search of κασσιτερον or tin), will account for the introduction of pure Masonry in very early days in England, and its corruption afterwards by the Druids. For its introduction into Greece, we must bear in mind that the founder of Athens, Cecrops, was an Egyptian, and Pythagoras a Tyrian, and that the intercourse with Egypt and Greece was constant.” We should like some Mason to tell us if it is true what Nicolai asserts, viz., that the two pillars were first adopted in 1646, at a lodge meeting held at Warrington, where Lord Bacon’s “Atlantis” was evidently discussed. In the first book of Kings (vii. 14-22) it is said, “And there stood upon the pillars as it were Roses” (compare second book of Chron. iii. 17). Certain it is Bacon takes these pillars as emblems for his symbolical engraving prefacing the folio edition of the “Sylva Sylvarum,” where we find them in company with the “New Atlantis,” and, of course, connected with the College of the Six Days, or of Creation, as we may see by examining the picture. We have a globe styled Mundus Intellectualis, placed as resting upon the Waters, or ocean, flanked on both sides by the pillars. Above Light as Creative is issuing forth from amid clouds, whilst one prolonged ray of Light descends perpendicularly towards the globe of the Intellectual earth, floating upon the waters. In the space between Heaven and Earth is written—

“Et vidit Deus luceum quod esset bona.”

This is a reference, of course, to Genesis, to Creation, and to the first created Light. Now we know that Bacon carefully planned and arranged all the details of the publishing of his works with the greatest forethought. It was his desire that the Natural History in ten centuries should follow the "Atlantis." We therefore know that these engravings with the two pillars are due to him.

Bacon gives us, in the "New Atlantis," a hint in the following it may be as well to mark :—"You shall understand (that which perhaps you will scarce think credible) that about Three thousand years ago, or somewhat more, the Navigation of the World (specially for remote voyages) was greater than at this day. Do not think with yourselves, that I know not how much it is increased with you within these threescore years, I know it well; and yet I say, greater than even now. Whether it was, that the example of the Ark, that saved the remnants of Men from the universal deluge, gave men confidence to adventure upon the waters, or what it was, but such is the truth. The Phœnicians and specially the Tyrians had great fleets; so had the Carthaginians their colony which is yet further west: toward the East, the Shipping of Egypt and of Palestina was likewise great; China also, and the Great Atlantis (that you call America) which have now but junks and canoes, abounded then in tall ships.

"At that time this Land was known, and frequented by the Ships and Vessels of all the Nations beforenamed, and (as it cometh to pass) they had many times Men of other Countrys that were no sailors, that came with them, as Persians, Chaldeans, Arabians," &c.

This is a very important passage. In the first place, it appears Bacon wrote the "Atlantis" (Spedding) in 1624. That is, two years before his death, 1626. And we may therefore consider it as his last work—a strange work every way, to issue from his pen in his old age. Now, here is a strange parallel. Shakespeare's last play is The Tempest. It presents us with a mythical island, which we cannot locate, and Bacon's last work is to present us also with a visionary island. Further, mark that in The Tempest, we have introduced the names of Dido and Æneas, and that the King, Antonio, Sebastian, Gonzalo, speak of having been at Carthage, at the marriage of Claribel to the King of Tunis (Car- thage). Now, in the passage we extract, and give from Bacon's "New Atlantis," note what he tells us about the Phœnicians, Tyrians, and Carthaginians, inasmuch as he is plainly hinting, that the extensive navigating, and voyaging spirit, of these people carried with them, the Persian, Chaldean, and Arabian men, "who were not sailors,"—another way of telling us, that the profound ancient religions, occult and hermetic science, of Persia, Chaldæa, and Arabia, found its way west through the Phœnician and Carthaginian ships, which we know to be the truth. But to what land did they sail? To this New Atlantis, or Land of the Rosicrucians; for in the countries mentioned—Persia, Chaldea, and Arabia—we have the sources of the three cults which are mostly associated with what we know of the Rosicrucian doctrines. Without John Heydon's narrative there is strong internal evidence in the "New Atlantis" to associate it with the Rosicrucians.

Miller writes:—

"Phœnicia, which in the time of Solomon, had risen into great power and opulence by her commerce, comprehended but a very narrow tract of land between Mount Libanus and the sea, about one hundred and twenty miles in length, and not more than eighteen or twenty in breadth. The Phœnicians did not aim at foreign conquest, for an acquisition of inland territory would only have encumbered them; and we have already seen that Hiram refused the gift of several towns in the land of Galilee offered him by Solomon. They extended their power and dominion, by sending out colonies, who continued their connexion with the parent state; and this tie was always held inviolably sacred. Their short line of coast was rich in bays and harbours, and adorned with lofty mountains, whose forests not only supplied timber for building their ships, but provided an important article of commerce; the cedars of Lebanon being in great request for adorning and beautifying magnificent edifices." ("The Architecture of the Middle Ages.")

So that the Phœnicians, and Tyre as their protagonist, or Mother colonising capital, form the centre, source, and vehicle from which, and by which, the most ancient Masonic lore, and Hermetic gnosis found its way to Spain, Ireland, Britain, and it is thus that the Druids and Celts came by their secret and mystic cults, that have so struck observers in their obscure resemblances to Eastern and earlier sources. Now we hold the theory that Bacon's mind, not only projected forwards into the coming centuries, but cast back also. Of which we have sufficient proof elsewhere; and that a restoration or "handing on of the lamps for posterity," went hand in hand with his inductive method, and is part of it. We must therefore doubly examine the plays, in order to find any references to these Phœnician sites, in touch with Hiram, and Solomon, and examine them as to indications of deeper Masonic origins, in touch with the Mysteries and Gnostic centres of the Ancient World.

Pericles.

From a general review of the poet's art, very much may be gathered by the profound student in a very short time, and we propose to say a few words upon this subject. First, let us begin with the commencement of the poetic and creative career, and we shall see that from the first, he takes myths, or locates his protagonists of his early plays, at places, which are great centres of Gnostic, Hermetic, or Masonic lore.

For example, the myth of Venus and Adonis is not only Phœnician in its origin (and therefore an early Masonic centre), but is Rosicrucian to its backbone, being the subject of their emblem, a cross and Rose crucified.

Pericles, undoubtedly one of the earliest plays, is laid at Tyre, Antioch, and chiefly Ephesus. Tyre is the most Masonic city we can think of, since Hiram Abiff, Solomon's great architect, was King of it, who plays such an important rôle in the degrees of Master, and Mark Mason. As for Ephesus, the city of the Great Diana, it was the centre and origin of all the Gnosis, and all the Hermetic science, which has been preserved to us, being the great highway between Europe and the East. It is this way that the Persian fire worship of two opposing principles came, and were embraced by Heraclitus, who dedicated his works to the Ephesian Diana. We see these principles accepted by Lord Bacon, as "Strife and Friendship," reappearing in the Sonnets, as Light and Darkness—the Rosicrucian philosophy of two opposing principles.

Ephesus is the most important place introduced in the play of Pericles. Thaïsa is finally introduced as high priestess to the Goddess Diana, in her Temple. And we think that this alone, is a pretty fair proof of the philosophic proclivities, at the commencement (mark) of the poet author's career:—

"SCENE III.—The Temple of DIANA at Ephesus ; THAÏSA standing near the altar, as high priestess ; a number of Virgins on each side ; CERIMON and other Inhabitants of Ephesus attending.

"Enter PERICLES with his Train ; LYSIMACHUS, HELICANUS, MARINA, and a LADY.

"Per. Hail, Dian ! to perform thy just command,
I here confess myself the king of Tyre ;
Who, frighted from my country, did wed
At Pentapolis the fair Thaïsa."

Just think over it. Here we have Pericles as Prince of Tyre ! Tyre, we repeat ? Why, Tyre was the city of Pythagoras, from whom the Masonic Historians extract the earliest origins of their symbols. And Hiram, also, the builder of the Temple—King of Tyre ! And Ephesus, with its Temple, and the wife—the lost wife (like Hermione), refound with the lost child (or Word ?), like Perdita again, in the Temple of Ephesus. But this is not all. We have, in this play, Cerimon introduced, who was the author of a History of Egypt, and gives us some information upon the Exodus, Moses, and Joseph. In the Two Noble Kinsmen, Ephesus is again introduced with altar and priestess in exactly a similar manner to the above. Here it is:—

"Still music of records. Enter Emilia in white, her hair about her shoulders, and wearing a wheaten wreath ; one in white holding up her train, her hair stuck with flowers ; one before her carrying a silver hind, in which is conveyed incense and sweet odours, which, being set down upon the altar of Diana, her maids stand aloof—she sets fire to it; then they curtsy and kneel.”

Ephesus, by its position, was the great centre or transmitting medium of Oriental ideas, which came that way into Europe from the East with caravans, that not only carried merchandise, but brought Buddhism from India, and the doctrines of the Zend Avesta with them also. The play of Pericles is as purely a philosophic, dramatized, personified, occult problem, dealing with centres of secret, or forbidden doctrine, as it is possible to imagine. At the very commencement of the play, we meet with the paradox of the trinity. We may here again observe, that the Rosicrucians, derived their doctrines chiefly from Persia, Chaldæa, and Egypt; and that in finding an early play like Pericles, revolving so largely round Ephesus and Diana, we have a hint to take us to Persia. In writing of the Great Goddess Mother or Nature (equally Diana of the Ephesians or Isis), Cory remarks:—

“She is not only his consort, but his daughter, as the work of his own hands and his mother, from whose womb he again emerged as an infant to a second life.” (Page xxxiv., Introductory Dissertation to his Fragments.)

We can see in the riddle with which the play of Pericles opens, that the poet is trying his early hand on this paradox, and that the paradox above enunciated is contained in the following, which is a trinity riddle:—

THE RIDDLE.

“I am no viper, yet I feed
On mother's flesh which did me breed:
I sought a husband, in which labour,
I found that kindness in a father.
He's father, son, and husband mild,
I mother, wife, and yet his child.
How they may be, and yet in two,
As you will live, resolve it you.”

In Pericles' solution of the riddle, we see the solution of Theological Mysteries, and Divine Paradoxes, set forth by the profound learning of the secret societies, and of the danger of finding a rationalistic answer to the Church's Mysteries. Pericles has to fly, and marries Thaisa, who is priestess of Diana—a pretty plain way of hinting Pericles embraces doctrines belonging to the shrine of the Great Goddess at Ephesus. But before that point is reached, we have the scene of the Lists, in which there is one truly Masonic emblem:—

“Sim. Who is the first that doth prefer himself?
Thai. A knight of Sparta, my renowned father:
 And the device he bears upon his shield
 Is a black Æthiop reaching at the sun;
 The word, Lux tua vita mihi.”

Masonry may be termed the science of Lux, or Light.

Rosalind as Diana.

Another early play of undoubted character, which cannot be said in the same sense of Pericles (Dr Farmer thought the last act, Shakespeare's), is Love's Labour's Lost. This is one of the profoundest and most difficult of all the plays to understand. In it we have Rosalind, who is sometimes described by writers on this play as “a negress of sparkling wit and beauty,” but who is in reality the Black Mistress of the Sonnets, and the Rosalind of Chester's “Love's Martyr.” In the latter work she is brought in on the title page as “Rosalin's complaint metaphorically applied to Nature”;¹ that is a type and feature of Nature herself. But the Great Goddess Mothers, who represented Nature, were, like Diana of Ephesus, The Indian Bhavani, and the Isis or Virgin of the World of Hermes Trismegistus—Black or Ethiopians. Why? Because they typified the primeval darkness, or matrix, out of which everything was born. "For Darkness was upon the face of the Deep," says Genesis. And out of this Darkness sprang forth the Light. All the old Aryan Mythology revolves round this conflict of Light and Darkness, as Sir George Cox points out so fully in his "Mythology of the Aryan Nations." But the black colour of the Great Nature Goddesses is well known, and to this day has its reproduction in some Black statues of Madonnas. The Earth, is the Great Mother, with her underground darkness—for it is out of this darkness, that the seed, the spring, summer, and harvest come forth. So that this colour is in perfect harmony with the subject, Nature from its female, passive, and productive side only.

Now Rosalind in Love's Labour's Lost, is introduced with hints that bespeak her as Diana of Ephesus. We know that the statue of Diana was made of Ebony Wood from Vitruvius (sometimes of Cedar), and that she personified the earth as we have stated, and that her opposite or male side (for all these great goddesses were androgynous), represented Light or the Sun. The priests of Diana were eunuchs, signifying the sexless character of their goddess as "Master-Mistress;" and if the student will turn to Love's Labour's Lost, he will find the portrait there given unmistakable.

First.—She is the Sun.

Biron. O, but for my love, day would turn to night."¹

Secondly.—She is as black as ebony.

King. By heaven, thy love is black as ebony."

A wife of such wood were felicity.

O, who can give an oath? where is a book?

That I may swear beauty doth beauty lack,

If that she learn not of her eye to look:

No face is fair, that is not full so black.

King. O paradox! Black is the badge of hell,

The hue of dungeons, and the scrawl of night:

And beauty's crest becomes the heavens well.

Biron. Devils soonest tempt, resembling spirits of light."

Thirdly.—She is the earth.

Dumain. I never knew man hold vile stuff so dear.
Long. Look, here's thy love, my foot and her face see."

Fourthly.—She is related to the underworld through some hideous and awful attribute.

Biron. I'll prove her fair, or talk till doomsday here.
King. No devil will fright thee then so much as she."

Now, how are we going to reconcile all these contradictions? We reply, that (Rosalind) Diana of Ephesus, as—light,—and darkness—(inscribed upon her statue)—made of ebony wood, the symbol of the black earth, was Mother of all things. The hint that Shakespeare gives us in the ebony wood, and her black colour, is quite sufficient to identify her. Now what does Montaucon tell us of the statues of Artemis or Diana of Ephesus? "That they were black, or made of ebony wood." (V., p. 578, vol. ii., Edit. IV., Creuzer's "Symbolik.")

"Tectum templi extabulis erat cedrinis, ejusdemque materiae Dianæ statua; alii vero teste Plinio dicebant statuam ex ebeno esse." (L'Antiquité Expliquée, vol. ii., p. 86. Bernard de Montfaucon.)

Vitruvius maintains the statue of Diana was made of Cedar. Now this doubtful testimony as to whether cedar or ebony were the materials employed, seems to have found its reflection in Shakespeare.

"Enter DUMAIN with a paper.

DUMAIN transform'd! four woodcocks in a dish!

Dum. O most divine Kate!

Biron. O most profane coxcomb!

Dum. By heaven, the wonder in a mortal eye!

Biron. By earth, she is not, corporal, there you lie.

Dum. Her amber hair for foul hath amber quoted.

Biron. An amber-colour'd raven was well noted.

Dum. As upright as the cedar.

Biron. Stoop, I say:

Her shoulder is with child.

Dum. As fair as day.

Biron. Ay, as some days, but then no sun must shine."

HERMES
MERCURIUS TRISMEGISTUS.

NATURE
VIRGIN OF THE WORLD.
OR ROSALIND.

It is no use the critics blanching,¹ or pretending to overlook these things, which are everywhere in the plays for those who can recognise them. Again of Rosalind as the sun or Lux :—

“ A withered hermit, five-score winters worn
 Might shake off fifty looking in her eye :
 Beauty doth varnish age, as if new-born,
 And gives the crutch the cradle's infancy,
 O ! 'tis the sun, that maketh all things shine ! ”

Creuzer seems to think that everything about the Ephesian Diana's statue and decoration, bespeak an Egyptian or Æthiopian origin. And this we think ourselves. We find in the preface of Chester's "Love Martyr or Rosalind's Complaint," a curious comparison to an Æthiopian :—

“ Honourable Sir, having, according to the directions of some of my best minded friends, finished my long expected labour ; knowing this ripe judging world to be full of envy, every one (as sound reason requireth) thinking his own child to be fairest, although an Æthiopian, I am emboldened to put my infant wit to the eye of the world under your protection, knowing that if absurditie like these have crept into any part of these poems, your well graced name will overshadow these defaults, and the knowne character of your virtues, cause the common back-biting enemies of good spirits to be silent. To the World I put my Child to nurse, at the expense of your favour, whose glorie will stop the mouthes of the vulgar, and I hope cause the learned to rocke it asleep (for your sake) in the bosom of good Will.² Thus wishing you all the blessings of heaven and earth ; I end.

“ Yours in all service,

“ RO. CHESTER.”

¹ See what Bacon says about “blanching the obscure places” and “discoursing upon the plain ;” with regard to commentators and emendators of authors, so that the most corrected editions are the worst. Chapter viii.

² This good Will seems a sly hint for Will Shakespeare.

We find this same comparison of Æthiophe again in context with the Rosalind of Love's Labour's Lost ;—

“ Dumain. To look like her are chimney-sweepers black.
Long. And since her time are colliers counted bright.
King. And Ethiopes of their sweet complexion crack.
Dumain. Dark needs no candles now, for dark is light.”

In this Æthiopian Rosalind we have Mr Rider Haggard's “She,” although his prototype comes from another source in Moore's Epicurean. Diana is also Ilythia, Latona (primæval night)—Nature,—for they all represent similar concepts.

CXXVII.

“ In the old age black was not counted fair,
 Or if it were, it bore not beauty's name ;
 But now is black beauty's successive heir,
 And beauty slander'd with a bastard shame :
 For since each hand hath put on nature's power,
 Fairing the foul with art's false borrow'd face,
 Sweet beauty hath no name, no holy hour,
 But is profan'd, if not lives in disgrace.
 Therefore my mistress' eyes are raven black,
 Her eyes so suited ; and they mourners seem
 For I have sworn thee fair, and thought thee bright,
 Who art as black as hell, as dark as night.”

The Comedy of Ephesus, again, is partly laid at Ephesus. As for the name of Diana, it is the Deus ex machinâ with which the poet conjures. Take All's Well that Ends Well, where we have the character of Diana, not because, as some shallow critic would observe, the part played fits the name, but because Helena and Diana are two names for the same thing, and the exchange of rôle is the profound symbolism of the paradox of identity and difference belonging to the principles of this art exemplified in this play, as opposites and unity. Diana is the reconciler and the enlightener.

Widow Dido.

In a passage quoted from The Tempest, we have the strange bringing in of Dido as “Widow Dido.”

“ Hiram, the widow's son,
 Sent to King Solomon,
 The Great Keystone ;

On it appears the name,
Which raises high the fame
Of all, to whom the same
Is truly known."

Now, in certain ceremonies pertaining to certain Masonic degrees, there is a substitution of the Candidate for Hiram, and from this, no doubt, is the origin of the expression used sometimes for Masons, "the Widow's Sons." Is there no key hidden in this, or hint that may throw light upon "Widow Dido" in the passage quoted from The Tempest? Are there not extraordinary ceremonies in Masonry—such as the "lost word," "Hiram's murder"—that seems to have been invented with a purpose and end? De Quincey maintains that Masons called themselves Sons of the Widow because the Masonic expression, Sons of the Widow, has the closest possible connection with the building of Solomon's Temple. In the 1st Book of Kings, vii. 13, are these words: "And King Solomon sent and fetched Hiram of Tyre, a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali." Hiram, therefore, the eldest Mason of whom anything is known, was a widow's son. Hence, therefore, the Masons of the seventeenth century, who were familiar with the Bible, styled themselves in memory of the founder, Sons of the Widow; and the Freemasons borrowed this designation from them as they did the rest of their external constitution. Moreover, the Masonic expression—Sons of the Widow, has the closest connection with the building of Solomon's Temple." (De Quincey's "Rosicrucians and Freemasons," 423, vol. xvi., Works.)

Line and Level.

In The Tempest we find Prospero directing Ariel to spread some of his trumpery upon lines outside his cell:—

"Ste. Be you quiet, monster. Mistress line, is not this my jerkin? Now is the jerkin under the line: now, jerkin, you are like to lose your hair and prove a bald jerkin.

Trin. Do, do: we steal by line and level, an't like your grace.

Ste. I thank thee for that jest; here's a garment for't: wit shall not go unrewarded while I am king of this country. 'Steal by line and level' is an excellent pass of pate; there's another garment for't."

The "level" is the symbol of equality in Masonry. It seems to us that the "stale and trumpery" Prospero hangs upon the lines outside his cell to catch Trinculo and Stephano, are profoundly suggestive of the pursuit of mere ornament or externals in Nature or Art, by a certain class of people.

"The world is still deceiv'd by ornament."—Merchant of Venice.

These words come from a play, and are in exquisite harmony with a plot, whose teaching is, that the right life (or the next life) can only be won, by utter disregard for mere ornament or external. Upon the selection of Portia's picture, or the choice of the caskets, hinges and depends Bassanio's happiness. It is not gold, nor silver, but dull lead, which contains the reward. Heavens, what a moral! What depth, thus to place the reward of all that is above, by all that is below, under our feet—Death! For there can be no mistaking the poet's intention in the "meagre lead," which rather threatens than dost promise aught to present us with death;¹ so true it is in life (as in Masonry), that to gain heaven, man must risk death—"give and hazard all he hath,"—so shall we win or perish. The poet who wrote this was as profound as the universe, and those who are caught like Stephano and Trinculo, by the ornament of his art, superficially hung outside the lines of the plays, may think themselves lords of the island, but are very far from it indeed. The Shakespeare commentators and text emendators have stolen by line and level—that is, brought down a God to their own level.

Nothing could be more Masonic than the play of The Merchant of Venice, with its tale of the three caskets, with Portia's light or candle burning in her hall, with its faith and brotherly love of Antonio for Bassanio, whom he helps in difficulty with his purse, and with that profound hint of the leaden casket, which is as it were at the very bottom of the poet's art itself. For in this one

¹ "But thou, thou meagre lead,
Which rather threat'nest than dost promise aught,
Thy paleness moves me more than eloquence,
And here choose I, joy be the consequence!"

point we have the symbol of all the Mysteries, comprised in an allegorical death, in order that the candidate may be reborn to a better life, with its greater light and judgment.

The Eagle as Type of St John.

Bacon writes of the eagle and St John:—

“St John, an Apostle of our Saviour, and the Beloved Disciple, lived ninety-three years. He was rightly denoted under the emblem of the eagle, for his piercing sight into the Divinity; and was a Seraph among the Apostles in respect of his burning Love.” (“History of Life and Death,” 17, 18.)

Compare:—

“From this session interdict,
Every fowl of tyrant wing
Save the eagle feather'd king,¹
Keepe the obsequy so strict.

“Let the Priest in Surplice white,
That defunctive music can,
Be the death divining Swan,
Lest the requiem lack his right.”

—Phoenix and Turtle.

Those who know that the Templars (who are so closely connected with Rosicrucianism, and Freemasonry), were followers or Knights of St John² (as also in the case of the Knights of Malta, and of St Cross, near Winchester), and remember the “surplice white” of Masonry, will appreciate the significance of the two parallels, and what it signifies. Here is a hint from the poems:—

¹ “A thousand times the unworthy may clamour, a thousand times may present themselves, yet God hath commanded our ears that they should hear none of them, and hath so compassed us about with His clouds that unto us, His servants, no violence can be done; wherefore now no longer are we beheld by human eyes, unless they have received strength borrowed from the eagle.”—“Rosicrucian Confession.”

² The Order of St John is recognised as the most ancient system of Freemasonry ever known, and for that reason ought to be esteemed as the only true and primitive rite.

CVI.

“When in the chronicle of wasted time
 I see descriptions of the fairest wights,
 And beauty making beautiful old rhyme,
In praise of ladies dead, and lovely knights,

Then in the blazon of sweet beauty's best,
 Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
 I see their antique pen would have express'd
 Even such a beauty as you master now.”

What is this if it is not a hint to take us to King Arthur's Knights of the Round Table, or to the Templars who succeeded them? In Chester's "Love's Martyr" we have a curious history of King Arthur, and Rosicrucianism revolves round all these. Oliver writes: "‘It is believed in Germany,’ the Skipper interposed, ‘that Freemasonry originated from this sect (the Rosicrucians). The Baron de Gleichen says, that the Masons were united with the Rose Croix in England under King Arthur. I suppose he considers the Knights of the Round Table to have been Masons.’" (265, "Discrepancies of Masons.")

"The Templars are the successors of the Knights of the Round Table." (Hargrave Jennings's "Rosicrucians," vol. ii. p. 227).—
 "La Table ronde du roi Arthus, déagée de la célébrité fabuleuse qui l'entoure, était un chapitre de chevaliers Rose-Croix." (La Maçonnerie, 317, 1820.)

CHAPTER VII.

THE WINTER'S TALE.

“ The fixture of her eye has motion in't,
As we are mock'd with art.”

— Winter's Tale.

“ Let this interim like the ocean be
Which parts the shore, where two contracted new
Come daily to the banks, that, when they see
Return of love, more blest may be the view ;
Or call it winter, which being full of care,
Makes summer welcome thrice more wished, more rare.

— Sonnets.

WHAT is the connection between the title of this play and its subject-matter? How is it we find in this play of The Winter's Tale the story of Deméter and her lost child Persephone, not only in this particular point of loss and recovery, but embracing the separation and reconciliation that belonged to her worship at the Eleusinian festival? If the myth of Deméter or Ceres is incorporated, under a slightly disguised form, as the central plot of The Winter's Tale, then we have conclusive proof that the poet's art has a spiritual side, and promise of rebirth, because this myth was the ancient emblem for revelation and immortality. Nay, more, we shall have proof that this art is a vehicle for the mysteries, and that here it touches hands mysteriously with the oral transmission of Freemasonry. In every book upon the history of the craft, we find ourselves taken back to these Eleusinian Mysteries, and it will indeed be a significant hint for Masons to ponder over, that the same great mind that wrote the “New Atlantis,” and founded modern Freemasonry, should be found embodying in his art the antiquities to which they trace their symbols and their history. Bacon writes of his two methods: one is what he terms his oral transmission; the other, anticipation of the mind. It would be curious if we some day find these two methods answering and explaining each other. But, meanwhile, let us examine this play by the light of our theory.

In The Winter's Tale we find the prominent feature of the play to turn upon the separation of Leontes and Hermione, which is accompanied with the throwing out or loss of Perdita. The play leads or opens up to this point. Then, as upon the turning-point of a centre, it descends again to bring about the reconciliation and harmony of husband and wife, which go hand in hand with the finding or restoration of Perdita. It is the latter's loss and rediscovery, which is really so strikingly made to fit in with the separation and reconciliation. The finding of Perdita is one of the conditions of the oracle; and if the student reflects upon the play, he will come to the conclusion that the coming to life of Hermione, of her descent from her pedestal, depends upon the restoration of Perdita. In the presentation of Hermione, as a statue awaiting the return of her own child, we have undoubtedly—most unquestionably (in spite of all the world's contrary criticism even)—a portrait not only of the poet's own art, but of Nature in Winter, and of the Demeter and Persephone myth, commonly known as the wanderings of Ceres in search of her lost daughter. It may be disguised, altered, and beautified in the play, but it is there, "those holy antique¹ hours" of true

Finding the first conceit of love there bred,
Where time and outward form would show it dead."

—Sonnet cviii.

Again—

" In him those holy antique hours are seen,
Without all ornament, itself, and true,
Making no summer of another's green,
Robbing no old to dress his beauty new;
And him as for a map doth Nature store,
To show false Art what beauty was of yore."

—Sonnet lxxviii.

art—Nature's art, where "antiquity has been made for aye his page," and with which he has gone, as he declares "usque ad aras." Therefore it is most important for us to examine the evidence upon which we base our theory. And first, as to the myth.

The story of Ceres and Proserpine (their Latin names) is universally admitted to represent a beautiful allegory of the changing year. It is a personified tale of the earth life, and thus is a Winter and Summer story. For the loss of Proserpine and her restoration is but the history of Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, through which the earth life waxes and wanes as prototypes of life and death. Summer being ushered in by the Spring, and being lost in Autumn, was personified by a beautiful maiden associated always with flowers. She remains six months with her mother the earth, and then she is carried away by Dis or Pluto to the underworld where she remains during Winter. She is in reality the earth life or Spirit, that brings new life to sleeping Nature—her mother. With her advent everything puts on the glory and vitality of awakened Spring. With her loss the earth (her mother), falls into the icy image of death, or sleep—as Winter. The thoughtful reader will at once see, what a splendid allegory this is for an art affecting to imitate Nature, and present posterity with a rebirth or revelation. Because there is in this personified allegory of mother and lost child, just that falling asleep of Nature, which is as death to life, when compared with the reawakened glory of the restored life and spirit, which would be the spirit of interpretation as rebirth. Such an allegory not only holds out a picture of Nature, but as self-reflecting¹ suggests that the art borrowing the story is presenting us a hint of its own profound character.

We now have to show that whenever the poet introduces Ceres,

¹ Compare Sonnet 24 upon this self-reflecting revelation or rebirth. Also—

"To give away yourself, keeps yourself still;
And you must live, drawn by your own sweet skill."

—Sonnet xvi.

he thinks of Proserpine, and introduces her also, as is shown in the following passage from The Tempest :—

“ Ceres. Tell me, heavenly bow,
 If Venus or her son, as thou dost know,
 Do now attend the queen? Since they did plot
 The means that dusky Dis my daughter got,
 Her and her blind boy's scandl'd company
 I have forsworn.”

This is evident proof (if it were needed) to show that the rape of Proserpine (daughter of Ceres) by Dis, or Pluto, was not only known to the poet, but is introduced here curiously in company with Ceres. Now, directly we turn to Perdita in The Winter's Tale, where she plays the part of (mark it) a lost child (like Proserpine), we find her not only identified with the spring and flowers, but invoking her prototype Proserpine whom she so significantly resembles! Not only is Perdita introduced in the 4th scene of Act IV., as a kind of Flora, but extraordinary emphasis is given to her speeches, in which she treats of the seasons of Winter and Summer. If the poet were presenting us Proserpine herself (whom we know represented allegorically the Spring), with her new spirit and life, how could he make it more evident? Florizel says of Perdita :—

“ These your unusual weeds to each part of you
 Do give a life : no shepherdess, but Flora
 Peering in April's front.”

Note the expression, “unusual weeds”—for flowers are the “unusual weeds” that “do give life” to Winter in the Spring! She is identified with “Flora peering in April's front”! What, indeed, is this if it is not Spring itself? and mark the expression, ‘do give a life!’ What gives life? We reply, ‘Spirit’ only. And it is as Spirit that Lord Bacon interprets the story of Proserpine in his “Wisdom of the Ancients,” published 1609—the same year as this play we are treating of appeared, viz., The Winter's Tale, 1609! Bacon says :—

“By Proserpina is meant that ethereal Spirit which, being separated from the upper globe, is shut up and detained under the earth represented by Pluto." Again—"Concerning the six months' custom (the refinding of Ceres and her rape), it is no other than an elegant description of the division of the year, the spirit mized with the earth appears above ground in vegetable bodies during the summer months, and in the winter sinks down again." ("Wisdom of the Ancients," Works, Montague.)

The italics belong to us. We are quite satisfied in holding to Bacon's interpretation, which in the abstract is life returning to the apparently dead earth—rebirth—the revelation—of Nature's immortality—by a return of the Spirit. The separation of the Spirit from the body is therefore Death, or apparent death. For such is the condition of Nature during Winter apparent Death. Now let us note that the poet, in repeatedly making Perdita allude to Winter and Summer, gives us evidence that he is presenting us with a representative Proserpine of his own, under the alias of Perdita. First she is compared to a goddess—

"Florizel. This your Sheep-shearing
Is as a meeting of the petty gods,
And you the queen on 't."

We know that Proserpine was Queen of the Underworld—

"Perdita. And me, poor lowly maid,
Most goddess-like, prank'd up."

That the poet is thinking of the gods is most evident from the following passage:—

"Flo. Apprehend
Nothing but jollity. The gods themselves,
Humbling their deities to love, have taken
The shapes of beasts upon them : Jupiter,
Became a bull, and bellow'd ; the green Neptune
A ram, and bleated ; and the fire-rob'd god,
Golden Apollo, a poor humble swain,
As I seem now."

It indeed seems as if Florizel were but a disguise for Apollo himself, the sun which awakes the spring. Now let us give the flower scenes, so well known and so beautiful, where Perdita presents flowers to suit all her guests :—

“ Perdita. Give me those flowers there, Dorcas. Reverend sirs,
For you there's rosemary and rue ; these keep Seeming and savour all the winter long.

Pol. Shepherdess,—
A fair one are you—well you fit our ages
With flowers of winter.

Perdita. Sir, the year growing ancient,
Not yet on summer's death, nor on the birth
Of trembling winter, the fairest flowers of the season
Are our carnations and streak'd gillyvors,
Which some call nature's bastards : of that kind
Our rustic garden's barren ; and I care not
To get slips of them.

Pol. Wherefore, gentle maiden,
Do you neglect them ?

Perdita. For I have heard it said
There is an art which in their piedness shares
With great creating nature.”

We pause here to point out that if the earth itself were pictured presenting flowers of all seasons, it would be this lovely picture of Perdita that would suggest itself. We see that the poet especially dwells upon Winter and Summer, and their respective flowers in this scene. And once more we call attention to the parallel—for the myth of Ceres and Proserpine is a Winter and Summer story. We go so far as to say that it can hardly be considered an impropriety to call the wanderings of Ceres in search of her lost daughter by the same title as this play, viz. : A Winter's Tale. For what is this myth but the apparently dead personified earth in winter seeking for its immortal spirit or life, the lost child—rebirth in the Spring ! Let it be remarked that Perdita is allied with the Spring and Summer, not only as type of her own vernal beauty, but in a marked way which emphasizes the glory of full Midsummer. And be it here noted that Proserpine is often termed the Summer child of Ceres.

For the present we leave the pregnant passage whereby Polixenes identifies Nature with Art, and Art with Nature, aside.

Because though full of signification for our purpose, at present it only detracts from our main issue. And now we quote Perdita's speech upon her prototype Proserpine :—

" Perdita.

O Proserpina !

For the flowers now, that frighted thou let'st fall
From Dis's waggon ! daffodils,
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty ; violets dim
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath ; pale primroses,
That die unmarried, ere they can behold
Bright Phœbus in his strength—a malady
Most incident to maids ; bold oxlips and
The crown imperial ; lilies of all kinds,
The flower-de-luce being one !"

The flower-de-luce is the fleur-de-lis, a Rosicrucian emblem. Let us not overlook this pregnant passage. It shows us unmistakably by its length and invocation to Proserpine that the poet is full of thought upon this myth. Every flower he mentions is a Spring Flower, and therefore in the most perfect harmony with the address to the goddess who was the personification of Spring—Proserpine.

We thus see that there is much in this scene to show that the poet always has the picture of Proserpine in his mind's eye ! At the point where she returns to her father, and brings life to her mother, the king exclaims—

" Welcome hither
As is the spring to the earth."

But the really striking parallel to the myth is that in the final presentation of Hermione as a statue. We have the following from Themistius, who tells us, writing in the fourth century of the Christian era (illustrating his father's exposition of Philosophy), " the priest throwing open the propylæ of the Temple at Eleusis, whereupon the statue of the goddess under a burst of light appeared in full splendour, and the gloom and darkness in which the spectators have been were dispelled." (Christie's Disquisitions, 59.)

For the unclassical reader to understand fully this passage, and the extraordinary parallel of circumstance, we must explain that Ceres was the goddess whose statue was thus shown (in Greek, Demêter). She it was who not only represented the earth, but, like Hermione, had a daughter who (like Perdita) was lost. The entire myth, which was the central doctrine of the Eleusinian Mysteries, was this myth of the sleeping earth—awaiting the return of its lost Spring child to restore it to life again. It was the history of the year, dramatised and personified to illustrate the immortality of Nature, and the immortality of the soul. Indeed it is round the altars of this Demêter and of Dionysos (Ceres and Bacchus) that the drama took its origin. And the protagonists of this drama were a mother and a lost child, in the same sense of separation and final reconciliation, that we see reproduced in The Winter's Tale. It is for us now to examine any further facts in the play, that can reinforce the resemblance. And, first of all, here is one. Hermione is a name the poet invents and did not borrow, inasmuch as in the original from which The Winter's Tale is taken, the original of Hermione is called Bellaria. Bellaria dies in the middle of Greene's story ("Pandosto, or the triumph of Time," 1588). Nothing of the original is preserved. The introduction of the statue is also original, and, most of all, this name Hermione. Now Hermione was a city on the coast of Argolis, where Ceres had a famous temple. Aelianus calls the feasts or banquets at Hermione χθονία ιοπρή. And we also know that at Syracuse a Demêter and Kore were honoured under the name of Hermione. (Heysch., p. 1439.)

But we have another striking parallel to point out. The story of the rape of Proserpine belongs to Sicily, for it was whilst Proserpine was gathering flowers upon the plains of Enna, in Sicily, that Pluto surprised her and carried her off below. We thus see that there is an important local connection obtaining between the play and the classical fable we are illustrating.

We must now ask ourselves the question, whether in the selec-

We see at once that Miranda (which is Latin for "wonderful things") is no chance name, but carefully and consciously selected by the poet.

Or take the name of Borachio in Much Ado About Nothing. It means a drunkard. ("From the Spanish "borachoe" or "borracho," a bottle made of pig's skin, with the hair inside, dressed with resin and pitch to keep the wine sweet."—Minshew.) The proof that the author of the play knew the meaning of the word, and introduced it on that account, is shown in the way Borachio plays upon his own name—

"I will like a true drunkard (Borachio) utter all to thee."—(iii. 5).

Here is evidence that the writer was acquainted with Spanish.

Upon a further examination of the name Hermione, we find that it is strangely connected with Harmonia, and with Demêter. And it is indeed a curious fact that one of the great doctrines taught at Eleusis round the statue of Demêter (Ceres) WAS THE SEPARATION OF MATTER AND SPIRIT, AND THEIR RECONCILIATION. The entire play of The Winter's Tale turns upon separation and final reconciliation. This is the subject-matter of the play, discord and separation, to be followed by reconciliation and heavenly harmony. Let it be noted that Perdita's exposure, loss, and rediscovery go hand in hand, with the separation of Leontes from his wife, and their final reunion. The rediscovery of Perdita, in which she is likened to the Spring, is closely followed by the discovery of the statue of Hermione, and her return to life. It is as if the lost Perdita were the instrument bringing new life to her mother! In the classical myth it is Proserpine who brings new life to the apparently sleeping or dead earth. Mark that Hermione is not really dead, but is pictured as a statue, devoid of life, awaiting interpretation, revelation, rebirth, or rediscovery, to be dead Art no longer, nor winter, but the year come full circle. We apply the epithet Art to Hermione as a statue. And we do so advisedly, inasmuch as in this play the poet has identified Art with Nature and Nature with Art. That is to say that this play may (from our point of view, or by the light of our theory) apply indifferently to the poet's particular Art, as an exquisite portrait of the Revelation and Rebirth which he has planned, pictured, and reflected in "philosophical play systems;" or it may apply to Nature generally. It was indeed a wise precaution of the poet to identify Nature with Art and Art with Nature, in a play which itself was reflecting, in its spiritual life, both at once! The whole of the Platonic philosophy is the identification of Nature with Art—God being the Divine Artist, the Divine Poet,—or Maker,—Creator. Nicetas (or Psellus), in his commentaries (in Gregor. Or xlii. 1731, D.), says, "Si Orpheo credimus et Platonicis et Lycio philosopho—Natura dei ars quædam est" (960 Aglaophamus. Lobeck). Indeed, the poet is perfectly conscious that Hermione, as a statue seemingly dead, yet alive, awaiting rebirth, is a splendid and astounding image of his unrevealed Art.

"The fixture of her eye hath motion in't,
As we are mock'd with art."

And then follows that solemn music, which is so mysteriously and strikingly brought in at moments like these, and which suggests a real lost chord which we must find.

Hermione.

Harmonia, or Harmony, Hermione, was the daughter of Mars and Venus. Mars and Venus is another expression for War and Love, or Strife and Friendship. Creuzer writes that Mars and Venus were always to be found placed together in the Temples of Antiquity: ¹—"Mars and Venus begot or brought forth Harmonia (or Hermione), which is, that strife with friendship brought forth the harmony or order of the universe. These are the well-known principles of Empedocles and Heraclitus out of the Orphic Theology, from which they developed and transferred themselves to the latest philosophical schools" (vol. iii. p. 21, "Symbolik"). (Vide "Die Briefe über Hom. u. Hes." p. 169); (vide "Plut-de-Isid.," p. 370); ("Heraclides Alleg. Hom.," p. 206, Schow); ("Proclus in Plat. Tim.," p. 147); ("Eustath ad Odyess.," viii. 266 sqq., p. 310); (compare "Empedocles Fragmn.," v. 203, sqq. p. 522, ed. Sturz, note, page 598); (Juliani, Orat. iv., 150 B., Spanh.).

Now it is very important, that in bringing forward our argument, we should show that in Chester's "Love's Martyr" we find a direct allusion to this philosophy, and its protagonists, Mars and Venus:—

"Upon a day I thought to scale a Fort,
 United with a tower of sure defence;
 Uncomfortable thres (sic) did narre my sport,
 Unlucky Fortune with my woes expense,
 Venus with Mars would not sweet war commence;
 Upon an altar would I offer Love,
 And sacrifice my soule's poore Turtle-Dove."

—Chester's "Love's Martyr."

Now here is some curious evidence afforded us, which we may review in the following order:—Bacon declares, "STRIFE AND FRIENDSHIP IN NATURE ARE THE SPURS OF MOTIONS AND THE KEYS OF WORKS." In another place he connotes these doctrines with the names of Empedocles and Heraclitus. So that, as we have seen in our quotation from Creuzer, these are the philosophical principles which, as "Love and Warfare"—(Venus and Mars)—gave birth to Hermione or Harmonia; in short, the law and harmony of the orderly universe. Again, it is very clear that the subject-matter of Chester's "Love's Martyr," round which the poems mysteriously circle, is connected, not only with "a rare piece of art," challenging comparison with Homer, but is connected with these classical principles of "Strife and Friendship," which sprang from Ephesus, and are the origins of the Platonic philosophy. Not only this, but we find in a play attributed to Shakespeare (or to the author of the plays that bear his name), a most direct reference and introduction of the protagonists of these philosophical principles. In the Two Noble Kinsmen, we find a scene laid before the altars of Mars and Venus.

Mr Brown tells us that "the marriage of Cadmus with Harmonia (or Hermione), is the union of Thought with the orderly Material World." Hermione, we find, was a daughter of Venus and Mars, or of Love and War, which Bacon terms Friendship and Strife! It is these two principles which we recognize running throughout entire Nature as Gravitation and Repulsion, centripetal and centrifugal—heavy and light, dense and rare, &c. It was these principles which were taught at Eleusis in connection with Ceres or Deméter, as Creuzer has already told us. So that in these principles of antitheta or opposites, we have the philosophical system of the Mysteries presented to us, as the conflict of the dualism in Nature. The parentage of Hermione carries with it the conviction that she is only a name to represent the harmony which is the result of these two principles of Love and Hate, or Warfare. That Shakespeare has Harmonia in his mind is plain, not only by the music or harmony associated with her discovery, and restoration to her lost child and husband, but by the profound hint he gives in the following line:—

"The mantle of Queen Hermione, her jewel about the neck of it."

At the marriage of Hermione to Cadmus, she received as present a splendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. Now, we know that at a town called Hermione, there was a temple celebrated to Ceres or Deméter. So that there is a completely established connection in classical history to very closely identify Hermione with Ceres herself. And this is particularly apparent in the fact, that the "eternal war of Eleusis" was the doctrine of the conflict of spirit and matter, or of two opposed principles, which we see gave birth to Hermione. Mr Brown writes of Cadmus, "Harmonia, his bride, is a Phœnician personage with an Hellenik name. The meaning of the translation must, then, be first obtained. From harma 'together' is derived harmos 'any means of joining things,' as a joint or clasp. Hence it is used of immaterial clasps as covenants, leagues, laws; and these strongly conveying the idea of orderly arrangement, it becomes connected with proportion, i.e., due proportion in architecture, sound, or character. Hence it is more specially applied to cadence and modulation, and so the full meaning of the word is, That-which-is-fitted-together-in-due-proportion. But in a Phœnician and Kosmogonical connection that which is fitted together in due proportion is the Kosmos itself. Harmonia, then, represents the orderly material Kosmos, and so we find her in the myth as wearing a starry robe. Bunsen observes, 'The wife of Cadmus, Harmonia dressed in a robe studded with stars, and wearing a necklace representing the universe—has a palpably kosmogonical meaning.' ("Egypt's Place," iv. 231; Brown's "Great Dionysiak Myth.," ii. 237.)

Perdita, the sleeping beauty in the wood,—briar-rose, sleeps for hundreds of years until Prince Florizel comes with his gladdening rays to wake her from her trance-like sleep. In this case Perdita is but the awakening of her mother, the earth, from the deep sleep of winter to the glory of, and life of the spring and summer. Wilder remarks (in his Introduction to the "Bacchic and Eleusinian Mysteries of Taylor") :—

"The veriest dreams of life, pertaining as they do to the minor mystery of death, have in them more than external fact can explain or reach; and Myth, however much she is proved to be a child of earth, is also received among men as the child of heaven. The Cinder-Wench of the Ashes will become the Cinderella of the Palace, and be wedded to the King's son."

The reader remembers, perhaps, having read before of Prince Florizel in some German fairy stories. The union of the wildest dreams of the imagination with reality, is true miracle. It is the transformation of the ideal into the real, and if this play deals with reality, we may understand, perhaps, why Shakespeare has introduced this King's son, and made Perdita a princess brought up in a sheep cot. Every incident of this play is, perhaps, the union of reality under the guise of poetry with the ideal, to teach a lesson that poetry is divine, and is indeed the only real.

If we hark back, and contemplate the title of the original from which the author borrowed, the title will be found allied with Time.

PANDOSTO, OR THE
TRIUMPH OF TIME.

We would here insert Sir George Cox's remark about the story of the "House in the Wood":—

"The return of Persephone is strangely set forth in the story of the 'House in the Wood,' which in other stories is the house, or case of ice, in which the seemingly dead princess is laid; the ice at the return of spring. The sides crack, 'the doors were slammed back against the walls; the beams groaned as if they were being riven away from their fastenings; the stairs fell down, and at last it seemed as if the whole roof fell in.' On waking from her sleep the maiden finds herself in a splendid palace, surrounded by regal luxuries. The maiden has returned from the dreary abode of Hades to the green couch of the life-giving mother."

In the tale of "Cinderella," we have another embodied myth of death and rebirth, of Summer and Winter. The very name, Cinderella,—“the cinder-wench of the ashes,”—(as A. Wilder observes), points to close connection with earth and with death, and thus with resurrection. We cannot refrain from quoting the poet's final words, attached to the threne, or death-lamentation, of the poem of the Phoenix and Turtle:—

“Beauty, truth, and rarity,
Grace in all simplicity,
Here enclosed in Cinders lie.”

Let the parallel be marked. Florizel is a King's Son, and he marries the Cinderella of the sheepcote, Perdita, who (like Cinderella) turns out to be a Princess in disguise, and with whose rediscovery, reconciliation and new life are given to her mother—(the earth),—and probably (if all were discovered) a spiritual new life or rebirth to the poet's entire art also,—of which Hermione (as a statue), alive but seemingly dead, is a singular and exquisite portrait.

Writing of Guzra Bai, the heroine of the story of "Truth's Triumph," Sir George Cox says ("Mythology of the Aryans")—

"This beautiful maiden is the Flower Girl, or the Gardener's daughter, in other words, the child of Démêtêr playing on the flowery plain of Nysa or Enna,—the teeming source of life as distinguished from the dead or inert matter on which it works."

But this is exactly what Perdita is in The Winter's Tale—a Flower girl—and not only a Flower girl, but the Cinderella of our childhood, who is always a Princess in disguise, awaiting discovery. "All writers, both ancient and modern, have united in setting Truth before us under the image of a virgin, described as a King's daughter, and thus called a Princess, always described as a surpassing beauty" ("Remarks on Shakespeare's Sonnets," E. A. Hitchcock). Prince Florizel is the Prince of Fairy Tales, who comes to wake the sleeping beauty in the wood, Briar-Rose, after her sleep of hundreds of years. I suppose so great an authority as Sir George Cox will be entitled to some weight in this matter. Let the student take up his "Mythology of the Aryans," and he will find the author distinctly tracing and identifying the Cinderella story with the Persephone legend, as both derived from the resurrectionary powers of Nature, typified in the return of Spring and Summer after Winter. It is this Phoenix-like power which is the real secret of the plays hitherto considered Shakespeare's.

Although the evidence of a monumental inscription is not of much weight, we read at Stratford that with Shakespeare "Quick Nature died,"¹ which, to our minds, is a very profound reference

"Why should he live now nature bankrupt is,
 Beggar'd of blood to blush through lively veins?
 For she hath no exchequer now but his,
 And proud of many, lives upon his gains.
 O, him she stores, to show what wealth she had,
 In days long since, before these last so bad."

—Sonnet lxvii.

to the entire art of the poet, as perfect copy of Nature within and without—that is, a complete system of life and death, summer and winter, awaiting rebirth—the spring of its spiritual signification, to give it new life with the light of profoundest inquiry. Do we seriously mean to imply that this magnificent Art is relatively unrevealed? Our reply is in the words of Leonard Digges' prophecy—

“Shakespeare, at length thy pious fellowes give
The world thy Workes : thy Workes, by which, out-live
Thy Tombe, thy name must : when that stone is rent,
And Time dissolves thy Stratford Monument,
Here we alive shall view thee still. This Book,
When Brass and Marble fade, shall make thee look
Fresh to all Ages : when Posteritie
Shall loath what's new, thinke all is prodegie
That is not Shakespeares ; ev'ry Line, each Verse
Here shall revive, redeem thee from thy Hearse.”

CHAPTER VIII.

BACON AND ANTIQUITY.

“Crescit occulto velut Arbor ævo Fama Baconi.”—Manes Verulamini.

BACON writes :—

“Now if any one of ripe age, unimpaired senses, and well-purged mind, apply himself anew to experience and particulars, better hopes may be entertained of that man. In which point I promise to myself a like fortune to that of Alexander the Great; and let no man tax me with vanity till he have heard the end; for the thing which I mean tends to the putting off of all vanity. For of Alexander and his deeds Æschinus spake thus: ‘Assuredly we do not live the life of mortal men; but to this end were we born, that in after ages wonders might be told of us;’ as if what Alexander had done seemed to him miraculous. But in the next age Titus Livius took a better and a deeper view of the matter, saying in effect, that Alexander ‘had done no more than take courage to despise vain apprehensions.’ And a like judgment I suppose may be passed on myself in future ages: that I did no great things, but simply made less account of things that were accounted great.”

What is this “putting off of all vanity” of Bacon’s? Is he thinking of his renunciation and self-sacrifice as to the authorship of the plays? And what wonders are these that are to be told of him in after ages? Surely nobody who knows anything of Bacon’s solid judgment and sober mind, can for an instant believe that Bacon is only thinking of his inductive method? The language is extraordinary, because nobody knew better than Bacon that his system, or instrument of scientific discovery, might be termed great, but that it would speedily be forgotten by the generations who would make use of it, just as we cease to think of the inventor of a tool that we constantly use. No wonders to after ages can by any stretch of imagination be associated with it. Every day brings forth, it is true, the wonders of modern discovery. But though, like Hesperus, Bacon led the starry van, he was only at the head of a new method of natural research, which had already signalised itself in Torricelli, Galileo, Harvey, and Newton, who followed later. Does anybody pretend to assert that Newton's discovery of gravitation and its laws, was owing to his having studied Bacon? No, a thousand times no! And nobody knew this better than Bacon. What is "the thing," then, that he does not account great?

That is what we want to know. "For the thing I mean tends to the putting off of all vanity"! What is this "thing"? It is evidently a mystery, something upon which we are to reserve our judgment till we hear the "end"! What end? Is this "end" that mysterious far-off astronomical finality, that seems connoted and suggested with the strange title, "Valerius Terminus," and the annotations of Hermes, Stella?

Bacon's mind was the profoundest, subtlest intellect the world has ever seen. We see his imagination anticipating, (in the "New Atlantis") the telephone and phonograph, botanical and zoological gardens, pisciculture, and other inventions of modern days, in a miraculous manner. They are no shrewd guesses, but really downright exact prophecies, or anticipations, which the more we study the more marvellous they seem. And not all of them are even yet realized, though his prophecy of explosives more powerful than gunpowder, his sound-houses and observatories, are to a certain degree realized. Let no one smile at all this lest they betray their ignorance. Mr Edison, who dwells upon the Great Atlantis, has no doubt long recognised his peculiar discoveries as hinted at, when Bacon describes his sound-houses. But as people very often read without thinking, and think without attributing a serious purpose to the "New Atlantis," it may be not amiss to enforce a few of these prognostications home by quotation. This marvellous god-like intellect that refuses to lag one jot behind our times, can cast back as deeply into the past as into the future. Take care we do not find his ship laden with all the knowledge of the remotest antiquity!

King Solomon's House, described in the "New Atlantis," is nothing else but the New World, which in Bacon's mind is to be discovered by his new method. We can see that the discovery of the New World, had acted so keenly upon his prophetic and godlike intellect, that he foresaw a new Intellectual World, which he places likewise in the west, and anticipates in the realms of imagination. We see in the favourite device and frontispiece, his typical ship passing beyond,—plus ultra, through the pillars of Hercules to this new Intellectual Kingdom, or House of Science and discoveries, wherein he almost anticipates, and hints at some of the modern miracles of science, which have really become realized.—It would almost seem as if Bacon had seen or heard Edison's phonograph!

"We have also sound-houses, where we practise and demonstrate all sounds, and their generation. We have harmonies which you have not, of quarter-sounds, and lesser slides of sounds. Divers instruments of music likewise to you unknown, some sweeter than any you have; together with bells and rings that are dainty and sweet. We represent small sounds as great and deep; likewise great sounds extenuate and sharp; we make diverse tremblings and warblings of sounds, which in their original are entire. We represent and imitate all articulate sounds and letters, and the voices and notes of beasts and birds. We have certain helps which set to the ear do further the hearing greatly. We have also diverse strange and artificial echos, reflecting the voice many times, and as it were tossing it: and some that give back the voice louder than it came; some shriller, and some deeper; yea, some rendering the voice."

Or take this, does it not seem as if the writer were striving to describe the construction of guns and cannon by machinery, of the new explosives, ("new mixtures and compositions,") of gun-powder,—dynamite, which is indeed "unquenchable" in water,—and the submarine torpedoes :—

"We have also engine-houses, where are prepared engines and instruments for all sorts of motions. There we imitate and practise to make swifter motions than any you have, either out of your musket or any engine that you have; and to make them and multiply them more easily, and with small force, by wheels and other means: and to make them stronger, and more violent than yours are; exceeding your greatest cannons and basilisks. We represent also ordnance and instruments of war, and engines of all kinds: and likewise new mixtures and compositions of gun-powder, wildfires, burning in water, and unquenchable. Also fire-works of all variety both for pleasure and use. We imitate also flights of birds; we have some degrees of flying in the air; we have ships and boats for going under water, and brooking of seas; also swimming-girdles."

Here are zoological gardens and anatomical museums :—

"We have also parks and enclosures of all sorts of beasts and birds, which we use not only for view or rareness, but likewise for dissections and trials; that thereby we may take light what may be wrought upon the body of man."

Here are telescopes, microscopes, prisms, &c. :—

"We procure means of seeing objects afar off; as in the heaven and remote places; and represent things near as afar off, and things afar off as near; making feigned distances. We have also helps for the sight, far above spectacles and glasses in use. We have also glasses and means to see small and minute bodies perfectly and distinctly; as the shapes and colours of small flies and worms, grains and flaws in gems, which cannot otherwise be seen; observations in urine and blood, not otherwise to be seen. We make artificial rain-bows, halos, and circles about light. We represent also all manner of reflections, refractions, and multiplications of visual beams of objects."

Here are guanos and chemical manures :—

“We have also great variety of composts, and soils, for the making of the earth fruitful.”

Windmills and Watermills, Generation of Motor Force (not yet fully realized):—

“We have likewise violent streams and cataracts, which serve us for many motions: and likewise engines for multiplying and enforcing of winds, to set also on going divers motions.”

Observatories, Fish Culture, Condensing Water, Eiffel's Tower:—

“We have high towers; the highest about half a mile in height; and some of them likewise set upon high mountains; so that the vantage of the hill with the tower is in the highest of them three miles at least. And these places we call the Upper Region: accounting the air between the high places and the low, as a Middle Region. We use these towers, according to their several heights and situations, for insolation, refrigeration, conservation; and for the view of divers meteors; as winds, rain, snow, hail; and some of the fiery meteors also. And upon them, in some places, are dwellings of hermits, whom we visit sometimes, and instruct what to observe.

“We have also particular pools, where we make trials upon fishes, as we have said before of beasts and birds. We have also pools, of which some do strain fresh water out of salt; and others by art do turn fresh water into salt.”

Antiquity and its Restoration.

So much for the future and present times as anticipated and placed in the west by Bacon, on his New Atlantis, in the direction of the New World of America. Now let us examine whether this glorious intellect, in which poetical imagination is as godlike, as his sober judgment is solid and profound, does not freight his emblematic ship, with all that is most worthy to be preserved, and gathered, from the wrecks of knowledge in the Old World, to be married to the New?

The first thing that strikes us in a study of Bacon's works, is his contempt for much of antiquity, that we have considered worthy of respect. So much is this the case, that Goethe quarrels with him on this account :—

“ But, on the other hand, most revolting to us is Bacon's insensibility to the merits of his predecessors, his want of reverence for antiquity. For how can one listen with patience when he compares the works of Aristotle and Plato to light planks, which, because they consist of no solid material, may have floated down to us on the flood of ages ?” (Goethe's Works, vol. xxix. p. 88.)

But although Bacon casts Aristotle overboard, and makes light of many of the Græcian philosophers, we find him inclining to accept, (with implied reservations of his own,) the atomic theory of Democritus, the Strife and Friendship of Empedocles, and the fire philosophy of Heraclitus, (which greatly resembles that of Empedocles,) and which is connected with the Persian doctrines of two opposing principles. It is indeed curious to find Bacon drawing close to the cults representative of dual antagonistical principles, which philosophy is so conspicuous in the Sonnets attributed to Shakespeare.

“ But the elder of the Greek philosophers, Empedocles, Anaxagoras, Leucippus, Democritus, Parmenides, Heraclitus, Xenophanes, Philolaus, and the rest (I omit Pythagoras as a mystic), did not, so far as we know, open schools ; but more silently and severely and simply ; that is, with less affectation and parade, betook themselves to the inquisition of truth. And, therefore, they were, in my judgment, more successful ; only that their works were, in the course of time, obscured by those slighter persons who had more which suits and pleases the capacity and tastes of the vulgar : time, like a river, bringing down to us things which are light and puffed up, but letting weighty matters sink ” (lxxi., Works).

Again—

“ For the Homœomera of Anaxagoras ; the Atoms of Leucippus and Democritus ; the Heaven and Earth of Parmenides ; the Strife and Friendship of Empedocles ; Heraclitus's doctrine how bodies are resolved into the indifferent nature of fire, and remoulded into solids ; have all of them some taste of the natural philosopher—some savour of the nature of things and experience.”

We see that Bacon is inclined to look favourably upon these philosophies. We find Bacon elsewhere commending Telesius of Cozensa as “the last of the novelists.” He was one of the Italian reformers of philosophy, and he attempts to explain all things, on the hypothesis of the continuous conflict and reciprocal action of two formal principles, heat and cold. His other doctrines are either subordinated to this dualism, or merely complimentary to such a system. The disciple of Telesius was Campanella, who wrote the “City of the Sun,” which, like Bacon’s “Atlantis” and Sir Thomas More’s “Utopia,” is a visionary ideal of a better state of society. It is to be noted that Telesius joins hands with Empedocles and Heraclitus in a system of philosophic dualism. We have drawn attention to this because, in his works, Bacon devotes much space to this philosophy of “Strife and Friendship,” or Mars and Venus. He works it out under the forms of heat and cold, dense and rare, heavy and light, and mysteriously calls it the Keys of Works.

It is a remarkable coincidence that the Rosicrucians held similar principles for their philosophic system. They were the recondite searchers after the Wisdom of Persia and Egypt, searchers after the hidden mysteries of Art and Nature, and they were anti-papal. Here let us repeat that the philosophy of Heraclitus is derived from Persia, and found its exposition at Ephesus, around the worship of the great Diana, whose temple we find presented to us in the play of Pericles. Yarker (in his “Ancient Mysteries”) says, “The English Rosicrucians taught that two original principles proceeded in the beginning from the Divine Father—light and darkness, or form and idea.” These, of course, we see are nothing but the good and bad principles of the Zend-Avesta, Ormuzd, and Ahriman. But we will quote from Jacob Boehmen, who is generally accepted as a genuine member of the mystic brotherhood, and who happens to be in vogue at the present moment with occultists—

“The First Principle.”

“What GOD is, considered as without and beyond NATURE and CREATURE. And what the GREAT MYSTERY—Mysterium Magnum—should be. Showing how GOD hath, by his ‘Breathing forth,’ or ‘SPEAKING,’ introduced HIMSELF into Nature and Creature.

“The Second Principle.”

“Here beginneth the Great Mystery—Mysterium Magnum. Namely, the Distinction in the speaking of the ‘Word.’ Wherein the ‘WORD’ through the WISDOM becometh distinct. Also the evocation of Natural, Sensible, Perceptible, and Palpable (or Inventible) MEANS. Whereby the Two Eternal Principles of God’s Love and Anger—in Light and Darkness, in Good and Evil, in Reason and Faith, in Heaven and in Hell.”

In the dedicatory epistle to James the First, prefacing the Great Instauration, which we prefer to term the Great Restoration, these words:—

“Most Gracious and Mighty King,—Your Majesty may perhaps accuse me of larceny, having stolen from your affairs so much time as was required for this work. I know not what to say for myself. For of time there can be no restitution, unless it be that what has been abstracted from your business may perhaps go to the memory of your name and the honour of your age; if these things are indeed worth anything. Certainly they are quite new; totally new in their very kind: and yet they are copied from a very ancient model.”

The italics are ours. We have here Bacon’s words to describe his work as “copied from a very ancient model,” and directly we open and commence his preface, we find him writing thus, "That Time is like a river, which has brought down to us things light and puffed up, while those that are weighty and solid have sunk." Spedding acknowledges that Bacon looks back as well as forward, and his own expression, that of "handing on the lamps to posterity," is a sufficiently ambiguous one, must be confessed.

"Certain it is that the tendency was strong in Bacon to credit the past with wonders; to suppose that the world had brought forth greater things than it remembered, had seen periods of high civilisation buried in oblivion, great powers and peoples swept away and extinguished. In the year 1607, he avowed before the House of Commons a belief that in some forgotten period of her history (possibly during the Heptarchy) England had been far better peopled than she was then. In 1609, when he published the 'De Sapientiâ Veterum,' he inclined to believe that an age of higher intellectual development than any the world then knew of had flourished and passed out of memory long before Homer and Hesiod wrote." (Preface to "New Atlantis.") We find him in another instance quoting the Egyptians, Persians, and Culdees as more worthy sources of reliable authority. Thus we see his mind is equally inclined to go profoundly backwards, as to forecast the future.

Spedding draws attention to Bacon's "Commentarius Solutus," or sort of note-book, in which this passage is to be found:— "Discourging scornfully of the philosophy of the Grecians, with some better respect to the Ægyptians, Persians, Caldees, and the utmost antiquity, and the mysteries of the poets;" and again, a little farther on, "Taking a greater confidence and authority in discourses of this nature, tanquam sui certus et de alto despiciens." Now we cannot overestimate this passage. How is it Bacon is turning to the Ægyptians, Persians, and Chaldees, from whom the Rosicrucians derived their sources of learning? Samuel Butler writes in his "Hudibras," 1663:—

"As for the Rosy Cross Philosophers,
Whom you will have to be but sorcerers,

What they pretend to is no more,
 Than Trismegistus did before.
 Pythagoras, old Zoroaster
 And Appolonius, their master,
 To whom they do confess they owe,
 All that they do and all they know."

Hermes Trismegistus belongs to Egypt, Zoroaster to Persia, and Chaldæa especially has always been associated with the mystic brotherhood. (Vide "Zanoni," by Bulwer.)

Butler further writes:—"The fraternity of the Rosicrucians is very like the sect of the Ancient Gnostics, who called themselves so from the excellent learning they pretended to." As Butler lived within a reasonable distance of Bacon's times, and of the age when Rosicrucianism made itself felt, this is all worthy of our notice. At any rate, Bacon's own writing is evidence of his profundity, of the extraordinary far-reaching (back as well as forwards) propensities of his mind; and every student of this remarkable fact will do well to reckon with it, seeing that what we probably know of Bacon's mind, or of its learning, is but a fraction of the real truth. We now come to the mysterious confession of his adherence to antiquity, with regard to works.

In the "Norum Organum" (p. 41) we find Bacon stating that, he is going the same road as the ancients. "For if I should profess that I, going the same road as the ancients, have something better to produce, there must needs have been some comparison or rivalry between us (not to be avoided by any art of words) in respect of excellency or ability of wit."

This comparison of himself with the ancients is most curious, because there is nothing in his prose works to warrant the comparison. Nor can we by any extravagant stretch of fancy, imagine he is alluding to his "Wisdom of the Ancients," or his "Advancement of Learning." Bacon at the age of sixteen disapproved of the Aristotelian philosophy. "Not (as his Chaplain = Rawley writes) for the worthlessness of the author, to whom he would ascribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulness of the way, being a philosophy (as his lordship used to say), only strong for disputations and contentions; but barren for the production of works, for the benefit of the life of man. In which mind he continued to his dying day." (Life of Bacon, Rawley, ninth edition, "Sylva Sylvarum," 2.) If then, as we see, he repudiated the philosophy of the ancients in Aristotle, in what other direction can we discover that he accompanies them on the same road? In the "Advancement of Learning" he says—

"To me it seemeth best to keep way,
With Antiquity usque ad aras."

The Latin quotation is a curious and striking expression, meaning, "even to the altars"¹ (of Antiquity). But is there no sly hint here to the drama and its origin? For it was round the altars of the Greek divinities that the mysterious choruses arose, and the divine drama of the rape of Proserpine first took shape. Nor is our belief that he is thus alluding to the Greek drama lessened by the fact, that in the preceding section he uses the following quite unnecessary similes connected with the Theatre— "The play books of philosophical systems;" again, "The plays of this philosophical theatre" (lxi., lxii.). It is evident his mind is running upon plays and the theatre. And it is indeed curious here to call to mind the curious fact that Ben Jonson, in his "Discoveries" (printed 1640) makes use of the same comparison for Bacon as he does for Shakespeare. Ben Jonson, after describing many celebrities of his own and of the preceding age, arrives at Sir Francis Bacon:—

"Lord Egerton, a grave and great orator, and best when he was provoked, but his learned and able, but unfortunate, successor (Sir Francis Bacon) is he that hath filled up all numbers, and performed that in our tongue which may be compared or preferred either to insolent Greece or haughty Rome." Ben Jonson translated for Bacon his philosophical works. And, moreover, Ben Jonson was a profound classical scholar himself, not likely to bestow such praise unless it were deserved. But now comes the strange but significant fact that Ben Jonson employs the same words—the same comparison, “insolent Greece or haughty Rome,” to Shakespeare in the well-known verses addressed to him :—

“Or when thy socks were on,
 Leave thee alone for the comparison
 Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
 Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.”

Now these sort of parallels produce different effects on different minds. With some they are cogent proofs, with others they weigh nothing. To ourselves this is a tremendous piece of presumptive evidence that Bacon was the author of the plays, because Ben Jonson would never have applied the same comparison to Bacon that he does to Shakespeare—the exact words—unless he knew the truth. There is nothing in Bacon's prose works whatever to warrant any comparison of the sort. That Ben Jonson is alluding to poetry is plain; “filled up all numbers,” is to have written every style of verse, exhausted poetry. And even if we allow that some of Bacon's prose works could find favourable comparison with Latin compositions of like character, how are we to account for the Greek parallel? No! The truth is plain. Ben Jonson is alluding to the plays, and he is perfectly conscious who the real author is. He therefore applies to the real author (Sir Francis Bacon) the same comparison and words he employs for the false author. In each case we see he is thinking of plays that have surpassed the Greek and Latin dramatic masterpieces.

It is a remarkable thing to again find Ben Jonson, in his dedicatory lines prefacing the engraving of Shakespeare (which stands as frontispiece to the Folio Edition of the Comedies and Tragedies, 1623), using the same figure, or turn of speech, and idea, as is to be found in words inscribed round the miniature of Bacon, painted by Hilliard in 1578.¹ Mr Spedding writes :—“There is

¹ This was written before we discovered that both these parallels were brought forward in Mr Donnelly's “Great Cryptogram.” But as they are an inscription on a miniature painted by Hilliard in 1578, which indicates the impression made by his conversation upon those who heard it. There may be seen his face as it was in his eighteenth year, and round it may be read the significant words—the natural ejaculation, we may presume, of the artist's own emotion—Si tabula daretur digna, animum mallet: If one could but paint his mind!" (Life, vol. i.)

Now in reading the well-known lines of Ben Jonson, this idea is exactly repeated:—

"This figure that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakespeares cut;
Wherein the graver had a strife
With Nature to out do the life:
O, could he but have drawn his wit,
As well in brass as he hath hit
His face; the Print would then surpasse
All that was ever writ in brass."

The line in italics is nothing but Hilliard's words:—"If one could but paint (draw) his mind" (wit); and there is no question that Ben Jonson, who was Bacon's translator, and intimate, is thinking of Bacon. We quite agree with Mr Donnelly about the sense in which the brass is brought in by Jonson. We can fairly apply Shakespeare's lines to his own portrait, "Can any face of brass hold longer out!" (Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.) As Mr Donnelly truly points out, Ben Jonson is fully in the secret, for he applies the same language to both.

We are accustomed to translate "Magna Instauratio" as the "Great Instauration," but it is forgotten that Instauration does mean Restoration, or Renewal, also. How is it that Bacon, who quotes, every other few lines, a Latin or Greek author, has said that he intends keeping way with the ancients, "usque ad aras"? What are we to make of this declaration, uttered by a man who quite understands the expression he is using, which is "as far as conscience permits!" We find Bacon saying in his most important, we again advance them, acknowledging Mr Donnelly's complete prior claim to their discovery.

“Proæmium”—(which he “judged it to be for the interest of the present and future generations that they should be made acquainted with his thoughts”) :—“whether that (the) commerce between the mind of man and the nature of things, which is more precious than anything on earth, might at any time be RESTORED to its perfect and original condition.”

We see from this Bacon is bent upon a restoration, and his mind is not entirely occupied with only a new philosophy. What is this Restoration? Certainly not Aristotle's philosophy, with which he disagreed at an early age. Coupled with this we have to consider the reasons why he distinctly veils his method, not only in ambiguous language, which has perplexed his commentators and editors like Ellis and Spedding, but directly states his intention is to write so as to “choose his reader!” For what reason on earth should Bacon, who is apparently orthodox and profoundly religious, veil and obscure a philosophical new method, that depends upon clearness for comprehension? His philosophical method (ostensibly) pretends to unlock, by means of induction and experiment, a new system, by means of which man shall be able to arrive at the secrets of Nature. There is nothing in such an instrument to suggest the slightest necessity for obscurity or for mysticism. As we have remarked, such a system to be understood, must above all things be lucid, plain, and as far from obscurity as possible. But let us quote to the purpose. Spedding not only recognizes the fact that he desired to keep his “system secret,” but gives us (in his Notes to the Preface of the “Novum Organum,”) extracts from Bacon's own writings upon this point. Space does not permit us to insert all, but there are altogether ten selections from his works in which he insists or hints at the necessity of secrecy.

1. Valerius Terminus. Ch. 18.

“That the discretion anciently observed, though by the precedent of many vain persons and deceivers abused, of publishing part and reserving part to a private succession, and of publishing in such a manner whereby it may not be to the taste or capacity of all, but shall as it were single and adopt his reader, is not to be laid aside; both for the avoiding of abuse in the excluded, and the strengthening of affection in the admitted."

And again (Ch. 11), "To ascend further by scale I do forbear, partly because it would draw on the example to an over-great length, but chiefly because it would open that which in this work I determine to reserve."

Here is something that cannot be too sufficiently studied, i.e., that Bacon declares that he has "reserved part of his publications for a 'private succession.'" "This system is not to be laid aside." He determines "to reserve something—to publish part and to reserve part for a 'private succession.'" This is indeed more than extraordinary! Because it falls in with all that Mr Spedding remarks upon the plan or "distributio operis" of his work, which he divides into a number of parts, of which we have a large part wanting.¹

But we have additional proof that there was some reserved secret or mystery, some publications not comprised with the acknowledged works in the following—

"Publicandi autem ista ratio ea est, ut quæ ad ingeniorum correspondentias captandas et mentium areas purgandas pertinent, edantur in vulgus et per ora volitent: reliqua per manus tradantur cum electione et judicio:' the 'reliqua' being, as appears a little further on, 'ipsa Interpretationis formula et inventa per eandem:' from which it seems to be inferred that the exposition of the new method was not only not to be published along with the rest of the work, but to be excluded from it altogether; to be kept as a secret, and transmitted orally."

What are these "reliqua?" Where are they? Why should they be necessary? What do they treat of? And a thousand such questions suggest themselves. Mr Spedding labours, with praiseworthy simple-mindedness, to dispose of the mystery (being, to him, utterly unnecessary and unintelligible on any grounds whatever) in a thoroughly unsatisfactory manner. Why does Bacon give us this piece about publishing? Spedding ingeniously suggests that the "reliqua" is "to be kept as a secret and transmitted orally."

Here are facts of declaration on the part of Bacon that there are two ways of publishing. One is to acknowledge your works, the other is not to acknowledge them, and he pretty plainly hints that he has adopted both methods. What are the doctrines that are to fit themselves to the capacities and choose their readers? Surely not the Inductive Method with which Bacon's name stands connected! Spedding, after giving us everywhere abundant evidence of this kind, goes on to try and explain it, his lamentable failure doing more to strengthen the case than the quotations themselves. But he betrays all the time an uncomfortable feeling that it is above his ability. What is the oral transmission? Freemasonry is the only solution we can arrive at of this mystery.

Spedding writes:—

"The part which he proposed to reserve is distinctly defined in the fourth extract as 'ipsa interpretationis formula et inventa per eandem;' the part to be published is 'ea quæ ad ingeniorum correspondentias captandas et mentium areas purgandas pertinent.'"

We have given the Latin to avoid errors of translation. Here is something very curious. To our minds, nothing could more clearly indicate a double system of publication and of subjects related, as key to works. What is it Bacon has reserved? Are these the missing parts of the Great Restoration, or the plays known as Shakespeare's? Even Mr Spedding acknowledges the reservation. He writes—

"It is true that in both of these Bacon intimates an intention to reserve the communication of one part of his philosophy—the 'formula ipsa interpretationis et inventa per eandem'—to certain fit and chosen persons. May we infer from the expressions which he there uses, that his object was to prevent it from becoming generally known, as being a treasure which would lose its value by being divulged? Such a supposition seems to me inconsistent, not only with all we know of his proceedings, purposes, and aspirations, but with the very explanation with which he himself accompanies the suggestion." (Notes to Preface of the "Nov. Org.," 112).

Bacon writes :—

"Nay, further, as it was aptly said by one of Plato's school, the sense of man resembles the sun, which openeth and revealeth the terrestrial globe, but obscureth and concealeth the celestial; so doth the sense discover natural things, but darken and shut up divine. And this appeareth sufficiently in that there is no proceeding in invention of knowledge but by similitude; and God is only self-like, having nothing in common with any creature, otherwise than as in shadow and trope."

This passage is remarkable. Because it gives us a sort of key to Bacon's profoundest innermost thoughts and depths. It shows us that he regarded Nature as the "shadow and trope" of the Divine Art—that is, as concealing and hiding the celestial image. Now we find in Hamlet a play introduced (as interlude) within the play, representatively, or tropically (that is), as image or reflection of the King's conscience :—

"King. What do you call the play ?

Ham. The Mouse-trap. Marry, how ? Tropically. This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna."

So we find the expression "trope," "tropically" employed in the plays, and by Bacon in the same sense as image, that is, shadow or reflection. Bacon seems to us (in the passage quoted from him), to tell us that Nature is a reflection, shadow, image, of God—done tropically, which immediately recalls the playwrights' art. Indeed, we find him in the Dream terming his actors "shadows":—

"Theseus. The best in this kind are but shadows."

Again—

"Puck. If we shadows have offended,
Think but this, and all is mended,
That you have but slumber'd here
While these visions did appear.
And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but a dream."

Have we not (in the passage quoted above from Bacon) a key to his philosophical view of Nature, as the shadow, and trope or reflection of God? It is just such a view as we should expect of the author of the plays, which are all shadow and trope, being figurative and privative, of concealed light from first to last.

The Two Favourite Sayings of Bacon.

"And it appears worthy of remark in Solomon, that though mighty in empire and in gold; in the magnificence of his works, his court, his household, and his fleet; in the lustre of his name and the worship of mankind; yet he took none of these to glory in, but pronounced that 'The glory of God is to conceal a thing; the glory of the king to search it out.'"

This is Bacon's favourite saying. He repeats it at intervals over and over again throughout his works. And it is to be remarked that this is the only thing he does repeat, and that, therefore, it must have been very much in his mind indeed! We see at once that the secrecy or reserve of Nature, is to him the greatest glory of God. His admiration and reverence for the Almighty and His works, finds its top note of praise in what he rightly terms the "glory of God"—i.e., in the immeasurable silence and concealment which characterises Nature. To be hidden and revealed—concealed and open—is to Bacon the greatest of all proofs of the Divine Artist's excellence and Wisdom. In Bacon's view (as we see by his works), Nature withholds nothing except to the incapable. Nature is "openly secret," and, as he says, "infinitely more subtle than the senses of man." We find Bacon, evidently, and thoroughly, entertaining, and holding fast the belief, that God is in his works as the Divine Word. And that this is so, is shown in another variation upon this remark of Solomon's, which Bacon never tires of, but which is the key-note of his mind and character, so endlessly reiterated is it:—

"Whereas of the sciences which regard Nature, the divine philosopher declares that 'it is the glory of God to conceal a thing, but it is the glory of the King to find a thing out.' Even as though the divine nature took pleasure in the innocent and kindly sport of children playing at hide and seek, and vouchsafed of his kindness and goodness to admit the human spirit for his playfellow at that game."

We see that the idea of the Divine Nature, as playing "hide and seek," is only to be reconciled with the philosophy which teaches that the universe is the thought of God.¹ The Divine Artist is in His works, which reveal and conceal Him. Both Goethe and Jacobi had ideas of this sort. But it is Plato really who presents us with a world which is as a work of a Divine Poet, who has through the Word—(his archetypal Idea)—hidden himself in his works. Is it asking too much to suggest that the mystery as to the authorship of the plays finds solution in this admiration of Bacon's for "concealment" or "hide and seek"? Much argument and discussion has been carried on as to the motives which prompted concealment of the authorship of the plays. As yet the only arguments adduced are to the point that playwriting was a sort of "despised weed," and harmful to acknowledge during Bacon's life. This mode of reasoning is not worth much. But to come down hidden through the ages is sublime. And we have every reason to believe that the keynote of admiration sounded in the passages so often quoted by Bacon, was and is the keynote on which the entire cycle of the plays was founded—i.e., to come down to man after the fashion of Nature in plays which present an answer to what we are seeking, that, like Nature, are openly secret, and whose interest is heightened by the whetstone¹ of mystery, enigma, and profundity. One of the maxims of the Rosicrucians was concealment and sacrifice—to be everywhere, and know everything, yet be recognised by nobody, and to hand on their secrets from generation to generation in unbroken succession of ineffable silence.

Turn to the play of Measure for Measure, and we immediately recognise in the disguised duke, who, whilst supposed to be absent from his kingdom, is in reality ubiquitous, and watching and supervising everything, this idea repeated. It completely realizes the conception of an ubiquitous Providence perfectly concealed, yet directing and supervising His works, so that evil—even the wickedness of Angelo—is directed into an instrument of restitution. God affords no revelation of Himself outside or BEYOND HIS WORKS. Nature is the Divine Art, and the Divine Art, were it interpreted, would reveal the Artist's Mind. The discipline of life, of education and science, revolves upon this mystery of existence, where we are face to face with a mighty problem, that reserves nothing except the right of illusion through our limited senses. We have to mine, to work, and dig for truth, and we are bettered by the process. It seems to us there is much pregnant argument in all this to suggest (if not prove) that Bacon has put into practice, that which he so admires in the Divine Mind and Works—viz., concealment. We find Bacon eager for new intellectual wonders which shall rival the wonders of discovery of his own age in the New World. We find him inventing a New Atlantis, with Solomon's House, and presenting us with a frontispiece of a ship sailing beyond the pillars of Hercules in search of New Worlds, with the proud device, plus ultra. "For how long shall we let a few received authors stand up like Hercules' columns, beyond which there shall be no sailing or discovery in science, when we have so bright and benign a star as your Majesty to conduct and prosper us?"

Here is an eager mind, on the very tip-toe of expectation, looking for dawn across the ocean—to new worlds—in the direction of America—his little ship pointing west to that land from whence (as if his great mind knew and foresaw it) has first come the voice of souls to give him due. "Nor must it go for nothing that by the distant voyages and travels which have become frequent in our times, many things in nature have been laid open and discovered which may let in new light upon philosophy. And surely it would be disgraceful if, while the regions of the material globe,—that is, of the earth, of the sea, and of the stars,—have been in our times laid widely open and revealed, the intellectual globe should remain shut up within the narrow limits of old discoveries."

So that the "ship device" is no mere fancy, but a voyage of genuine *adventure*¹ of the intellectual sort, something sent forth upon the ocean of Time, which Bacon evidently thinks is as great from an intellectual point of view, as the discovery of the New World. How is it we find in the Sonnets this idea of a ship or bark repeated with unmistakable allusion to the ocean, and as unquestionably relating to the plays and poems?

LXXX.

"O, how I faint when I of you do write,
Knowing a better spirit doth use your name,
And in the praise thereof spends all his might,
To make me tongue-tied, speaking of your fame!
But since your worth, wide as the ocean is,
The humble as the proudest sail doth bear,
My saucy bark, inferior far to his,
On your broad main doth wilfully appear."

The allusion to "fame" makes the reference or subject-matter unmistakable. Here is a metaphorical poetical picture of an intellectual venture, or ship sent forth on the ocean of Time, to Posterity:—"Seeing now, most excellent king, that my little bark, such as it is, has sailed round the whole circumference of the old and new world of sciences (with what success and fortune it is for posterity to decide), what remains but that having at length finished my course I should pay my vows? But there still remains Sacred or Inspired Divinity; whereof however if I proceed to treat I shall step out of the bark of human reason, and enter into the ship of the church." (Book ix., chap. 1, "De Augustis.")

We thus see that Bacon employs the same image and even word "bark," we find in the Sonnets. Moreover, we find him addressing posterity in connection with this bark, which carries in it the precious argosy of the Old World and the New. So that we at once perceive that his work contains two parts—that belonging to antiquity (which he calls "going the same road as the ancients"); the other, this inductive method, which belongs to the New World. Miranda, in The Tempest exclaims—

"O, brave New World."

And the imagination cannot be bridled from perhaps as yet, premature speculation as to the whereabouts of Prospero's island of souls, to which this ship is bound, plus ultra, across the Atlantic. Is the island of Prospero the New Atlantis — (Plato's New Republic), the Ogygia of Homer, or the Avalon of Arthur, for Mr Baring-Gould, in his "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," has declared them all to be the same? But of this we have discussed at length in the chapter on the play of The Tempest. One thing is plain: in Bacon's system and works there is something incomplete, something that even his editors, like Ellis and Spedding, are at a loss to explain; an air of mystery and enigma (otherwise unnecessary); obscure references to art, to philosophical play systems, idols of the theatre, joined with a most extravagant faith in relationship to posterity. He writes as if he were going to reveal a world to us, and to put his system to a test, upon some model or exemplar, some copy of the universe.

Once more, and lastly, Bacon declares he is going "the same road as the ancients." This is a piece of evidence that it is impossible to explain or get over. For it cannot be his method of Philosophy. His method is inductive, and he disclaimed Aristotle. What is it, then? Does he join hands with the ancients upon their Mysteries, around their altars, with Heraclitus, Empedocles, the creative doctrines of Orpheus, and with the Platonic Philosophy? This, we believe, is the true solution to the question. It is in the plays that we find these subjects over and over again more than exhaustively treated. It is the origin of the Drama, which is his prototype, and which he even goes beyond, as Ben Jonson well knew when he declared that he had done and gone beyond "all that Insolent Greece or Haughty Rome had performed!" We find Bacon too instituting a comparison between himself, as a rival to the ancients in what they had done.

"Upon these premises two things occur to me, of which, that they may not be overlooked, I would have men reminded. First, it falls out fortunately, as I think, for the allaying of contradictions and heart-burnings, that the honour and reverence due to the ancients remains untouched and undiminished; while I may carry out my designs, and at the same time reap the fruit of my modesty.¹ For if I should profess that I, going the same road as the ancients, have something better to produce, there must needs have been some comparison or rivalry between us (not to be avoided by any art of words) in respect of excellency or ability of wit; and though in this there would be nothing unlawful or new (for if there be anything misapprehended by them, or falsely laid down, why may not I, using a liberty common to all, take exception to it?)."

¹ Will some of the clever sceptics explain to us wherein this modesty of Bacon's consisted, unless in his silence as to the plays?

Now, nobody can for a moment assert that the method commonly known as the Inductive, or the Baconian, has any rivalry, or is on any parallel lines with anything done by Antiquity. Bacon's is only a method after all, an instrument, and a system, which, though having foreshadowed all our modern discoveries and science, has nothing to place it in any category of comparison with Antiquity. Where, then, is this rivalry or road that he is going? Let us ask ourselves wherein rivalry could exist, so as to make these words real and comprehensible? We reply that Antiquity has one pre-eminent literary landmark or monument, wherein it stands discoverer, inventor, and beyond which nobody (except one) seems hitherto to have gone. We allude to the Drama, its origin and its source; the Mysteries, Greece, Æschylus, Euripides, Sophocles, whose motto might have been ne plus ultra! The only plays that can be placed in the same line are those known as Shakespeare's. But the comparison is, in some respects, disadvantageous to the poet; that is, apparently from certain points of view, and those points of view must be in every student's eyes—depth, seriousness as to didactic import; in short, a want of purport, to the apparent disadvantage of the Englishman. We say apparently only. It is certain that the Ancient Drama arose in the service, and around the altars of the Gods. It was thus religious in its origin, first commencing with creative hymns, which, as choruses, gradually developed into representative action and poetry combined. All that was serious, solemn, awful, pertaining to the creation of the World, its Mysteries, and the immortality of the soul, was included in it. It is philosophical and theological at once. Its serious purport and severe sense of retribution or justice are quite apart from anything modern. If Shakespeare instead had used these words to suggest rivalry with the ancients, on the same road with them, it would be partly explicable. Yet we should consider the comparison (which is undoubtedly one made by Bacon to his own superiority and advantage) as requiring explanation and development. Because (at first sight) the plays seem to have no points of contact or touch to institute a parallel between themselves and antiquity. In this work, we pretend to have discovered, the myth of Demêter (Ceres) and Persephone, not only incorporated in The Winter's Tale, but given in its title. Further, we re-find in The Tempest, and in the Midsummer-Night's Dream, unmistakable traces of the Mysteries. We mean by the Mysteries—the Eleusinian Mysteries—particularly the Demêter and Persephone myth—(which formed its central doctrine), and around which (together with the worship of Apollo and Bacchus) the drama takes its origin. If the poet has really done what we assert, then, indeed, the comparison which Bacon institutes needs no apology, needs no further explanation. If he has done this, then indeed he may say with his proud motto, that he has gone beyond Antiquity and the Old World in point of Art, plus ultra.

Unfortunately our space is limited, else the argument might be pursued further with even greater interest. We find Ben Jonson a contributor to that mysterious work, Chester's "Love's Martyr" (published 1601), in which Shakespeare's poem, The Phoenix and Turtle, appears. There again we find the Greek literature challenged and defied, with some humorous lines suggesting that "Old Homer" has met his equal:—

"Arise old Homer, and make no excuses,
Of a rare piece of art must be my song."

What description of Art is this that is going to surpass all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome have performed? It is Nature's Art, as Plato presents it to us in his Divine Philosophy—true Art in the second degree of initiation—not a copy of a copy, but of Divine ideas imprinted on matter,—as a stamp, die, or seal is imprinted on wax.¹

LXVIII.

"Thus is his cheek the map of days outworn,
When beauty liv'd and died as flowers do now,
Before these bastard signs of fair were borue,
Or durst inhabit on a living brow ;

¹ "Art," writes Plato, "is to be regarded as the capacity of creating a whole that is inspired by an invisible order; and its aim is to guide the human soul."—Philebus, pp. 64-67. Phædrus, p. 264.

Before the golden tresses of the dead,
 The right of sepulchres, were shorn away,
 To live a second life on second head,
 Ere beauty's dead fleece made another gay :
 In him those holy antique hours are seen,
 Without all ornament, itself, and true,
 Making no summer of another's green,
 Robbing no old to dress his beauty new ;
 And him as for a map doth nature store,
 To show false art what beauty was of yore."

Compare this—

"So that eternal love in love's fresh case
 Weighs not the dust and injury of age,
 Nor gives to necessary wrinkles place,
 But makes antiquity for aye his page ;
 Finding the first conceit of love there bred,
 Where time and outward form would show it dead."

Idols of the Theatre.

"But the Idols of the Theatre are not innate, nor do they steal into the understanding secretly, but are plainly impressed and received into the mind from the play-books of philosophical systems and the perverted rules of demonstration. To attempt refutations in this case would be merely inconsistent with what I have already said : for since we agree neither upon principles nor upon demonstrations there is no place for argument. And this is so far well, inasmuch as it leaves the honour of the ancients untouched. For they are no wise disparaged—the question between them and me being only as to the way. For as the saying is, the lame man who keeps the right road outstrips the runner who takes a wrong one. Nay it is obvious that when a man runs the wrong way, the more active and swift he is the further he will go astray." ("Advancement of Learning.")

In all Bacon's works, there is no passage so pregnant with reference to the plays, and to the ancients, as this. Can we not at once see that the "Idols of the Theatre" are the Idols of "the play-books of the philosophical systems," hitherto known as Shakespeare's, but in reality Bacon's? But first, let us examine what Bacon means by an Idol? An Idol is an image. But it is the image of something. It is that something, which is the "direct beam," whilst the image is "the reflected beam."

"For the third vice or disease of learning, which concerneth deceit or untruth, it is of all the rest the foulest; as that which doth destroy the essential form of knowledge; which is nothing but a representation of truth; for the truth of being, and the truth of knowing are one, differing no more than the direct beam, and the beam reflected." ("Advancement of Learning.")

Again:—

"It seems to me that Pygmalion's frenzy is a good emblem or portraiture of this vanity; for words are but the images of matter, and except they have life of reason and invention, to fall in love with them is all one as to fall in love with a picture." ("Advancement of Learning.")

"It is to be remarked that he uses the word idolon in antithesis to idea, the first place where it occurs being the twenty-third aphorism. 'Non leve quiddam interest,' it is there said, 'inter humanæ mentis idola et divinæ mentis ideas.' He nowhere refers to the common meaning of the word, namely the image of a false god. Idols are with him 'placita quædam inania,' or more generally, the false notions which have taken possession of men's minds." (Spedding.)

We find Bacon's entire theory of Idols, founded upon the worshipping of the False for the True, particularly these Idols of the Theatre, which we do not for a moment doubt, refers to the plays, and our worship of the mere image or Idol (reflected beam), which we confound with the "direct beam," taking the shadow for the reality. Let the reader study the passage in the original Latin, not in the translation, where, of course, the bias of the translator, has naturally endeavoured to bring the English into harmony with the subject, without any suspicion of ulterior meaning. That there is ulterior meaning—in short, that Bacon is really covertly alluding to his "philosophical play systems," which are rivals to the ancients, is most plain.¹ In the plays themselves, we find exactly the same contempt of words, as idols, liars, personified in the character of Parolles, whose name expresses his character—Empty Words :—

“I know him a notorious liar, Think him a great way fool, solely a coward.”

—All's Well That Ends Well, Act i. sc. 1.

Bacon has presented us with a system of philosophical plays, which shall exemplify his inductive philosophy. For example, we are face to face with the Idols of the Theatre, which we take simply, worshipping dead images, which are only reflections of inner spiritual truth, philosophically created like Nature to illustrate Nature.² The Idols of the Theatre are nothing unless in Bacon's own words, “they have life of reason and invention, else we fall in love with a picture.” All this is repeated so often in the sonnets and in the plays, that it is marvellous, and will seem more marvellous to later ages, how determinedly blind the human mind is where a prejudged opinion shuts up all the alleys and entrances to the mind against the Truth. Nothing illustrates better Bacon's Idols of the four kinds than the question of the authorship of the plays. Take the following double parallel and continue to doubt the authorship :—

“Thus, in the ‘Advancement of Learning :’—

‘Poetry is nothing else but feigned history.’

Twelfth Night, Act i. sc. 2 :—

‘Viola. ’Tis poetical.

Olivia. It is the more likely to be feigned.’

As You Like It, Act iii. sc. 7 :—

‘The truest poetry is the most feigning.’

¹ We are quite aware that Bacon first wrote in English, and had his works translated for him.

² “Pygmalion's frenzy” we see exemplified in Hermione upon her pedestal—“a picture” till she descends, when she will discover a life “of reason and invention”—which will show that the idols of this theatre are living, and not dead, idols.

'Natural Hist.,' cent. i. 98 :—

'Like perspectives, which show things inwards when they are but paintings.'

Richard II., Act ii. sc. 2 :—

'Like perspectives, which rightly gazed upon
Show nothing but confusion—ey'd awry,
Distinguish form.'

—"Bacon and Shakespeare," Smith.

Compare Sonnet XXIV. :—

"Perspective it is best painters' art,
For through the painter must you see his skill."

"A natural perspective that is and is not."

—Twelfth Night.

It is not the use of the same words which gives point to the parallels, but the identity of thought presented in the same language; which is striking. Both Bacon and Shakespeare reveal themselves as artists of the highest order, comprehending the proper use of perspective in the literary art—that is, in being openly secret. But to return to the passage quoted from Bacon, about The Idols of the Theatre; how is it he brings in so curiously the following :—"And this is so far well, inasmuch as it leaves the honour of the ancients untouched. For they are nowise disparaged, the question between them and me being only as to the way." With this compare elsewhere where Bacon declares he is going Usque ad Aras with the ancients, as "far as with conscience," but also literally "to the altars themselves!"

"Surely, the advice of the prophet is the true direction in this matter, 'State super vias antiquas, et videte quænam sit via recta et bona, et ambulate in ea.' Antiquity deserveth that reverence, that men should make a stand thereupon, and discover what is the best way: but when the discovery is well taken, then to make progression. And to speak truly, 'Antiquitas seculi javentus mundi.' These times are the ancient times, when the world is ancient, and not those which we account ancient ordine retrogrado, by a computation backward from ourselves."

But nobody knows or can explain what it is that Bacon means when he declares he is going "the same road as the ancients," unless it be the plays and their philosophical systems, which we maintain are copied from the ancients, as anyone can see in The Winter's Tale, Dream, and Tempest. But we do not expect to convert a sceptical age. Nevertheless, as the truth must ultimately come out, let us here lay just claim to having forestalled it. We therefore present the reader with the following passage, which in a moment reveals the writer's predilections—

"As to the heathen antiquities of the world, it is in vain to note them for deficient; deficient they are, no doubt, consisting most of fables and fragments, but the deficiency cannot be holpen; for antiquity is like fame, caput inter nubila condit, her head is muffled from our sight."

Yes, "Antiquity is like fame"—like Bacon's fame, with which it is partly identified, but as yet "muffled from our sight," hidden in the "region cloud."

"Why didst thou promise such a beauteous day,
And make me travel forth without my cloak,
To let base clouds o'ertake me in my way,
Hiding thy bravery in their rotten smoke?"

—Sonnet xxxiv.

Here is a subtle hint which Bacon gives us—

"To conclude, therefore: as certain critics used to say hyperbolically: that if all sciences were lost they might be found in Virgil." But where particularly? We reply, in the sixth book of the "Æneid," the science of the Mysteries, which is the keystone of the chief plays. But now take the following passage, addressed to the entire tribe of Shakespearian Editors, Commentators, Emendators, and Correctors, written (as Bacon so openly and unreservedly puts it), to "prevent the inconveniences future," clearly seeing that the great army of Mar-texts would so corrupt, vilify, and destroy the text, by bringing it to a level with their intelligences, as to cause great "inconveniences future."

" A CONCLUSION IN A DELIBERATIVE.

" So may we redeem the faults passed, and prevent the inconveniences future.

- "There remain two appendices touching the tradition of knowledge, the one critical, the other pedantical ; for all knowledge is either delivered by teachers, or attained by men's proper endeavours : and therefore, as the principal part of tradition of knowledge concerneth chiefly writing of books, so the relative part thereof concerneth reading of books : whereunto appertain incidentally these considerations. The first is concerning the true correction and edition of authors, wherein nevertheless rash diligence hath done great prejudice. For these critics have often presumed that that which they understand not, is false set down. As the priest, that where he found it written of St Paul, 'Demissus est per sportam,' mended his book, and made it 'Demissus est per portam,' because sporta was an hard word, and out of his reading : and surely their errors, though they be not so palpable and ridiculous, yet are of the same kind. And, therefore, as it hath been wisely noted, the most corrected copies are commonly the least correct.

"The second is concerning the exposition and explication of authors, which resteth in annotations and commentaries, wherein it is over usual to blanch the obscure places, and discourse upon the plain."

Do we really think and believe that this was deliberately written with an eye to the future, with its corrections of what has been supposed to be a corrupt text, because "obscure" and brought down by vermiculate intellects to their own plain level ? We do most unquestionably. Has not Mr Donnelly already proved this ? Was he not obliged to obtain a photographed copy of the Great Folio Edition of 1623, wherein he at once noticed the irregular paging, bracketing, hyphens, &c., which led to his discovery of the cipher ? Fortunately those Folios exist ; fortunately they cannot be corrected, emendated, and otherwise vilified—or corrupted.

CHAPTER IX.

LORD BACON'S "HISTORY OF THE SYMPATHY AND ANTIPATHY OF THINGS."

"Merry and tragical! Tedious and brief!
That is, hot ice and wondrous strange snow.
How shall we find the concord of this discord?"

"STRIFE and Friendship in Nature are the spurs of motions, and the Keys of Works" (page 203, vol. v., Lord Bacon's Works).

"In the 63rd section of the Novum Organum he (Bacon) mentions very approvingly the philosophers of antiquity who taught this philosophy, of opposites or contraries, 'The strife and friendship of Empedocles, Heraclitus's doctrine how bodies are resolved into the indifferent nature of fire.'" (Spedding.)

These quotations point out that Bacon had accepted and adopted these philosophic principles, which we shall do well therefore to study closer. The most prominent and striking feature of the Sonnets, is the reiterated appearance of Love (as a male) in conflict and opposition to Hate (as a female). Sometimes they appear as Light and Darkness, as Truth and Falseness, Summer and Winter, Spirit and Matter, but always in opposition or strife. The Friendship is as prominent as the Strife. For this Friendship is for the friend of the Sonnets to whom they are addressed, and who is Love, Light, Logos, and Truth—the poet's alter ego—who is himself and not himself. The first thing that strikes us is the division of the Sonnets into two parts, not only by a line, but by the second part opening with the subject of a Woman, who, whilst being black, is connoted with the direct opposite characteristics of the male friend of the first division of these poems. And not only are these two antagonistical principles at War or strife with each other, but they form a paradox, inasmuch as one is embraced by the other under the androgynous term, "Master-Mistress." The Woman not only is termed hell, hate, and termed as "black as night," but she is everything the male friend is not. In short, we may say, whatever the male or friend is by nature of Affirmatives the Woman is the contrary by Negatives or exclusions. Nevertheless it is this female that the poet persuades his friend to marry for the sake of begetting offspring. In short, the entire subject-matter of the Sonnets is from the opening, persuasion that his friend may marry this seemingly detestable woman (whom many regard as a real personage), for the sake of immortality.

In the Sonnets we find this idea of Strife and Friendship not only prominently brought forward by the contrasted attributes of the male friend and the black mistress, but openly termed a War :—

"And all in war with time for love of you,
As he takes from you, I engraft you new."

Sonnet 16—

"But wherefore do not you, a mightier way,
Make war upon this bloody tyrant time?"

Sonnet 35—

"Such civil War is in my Love and Hate,
That I, an accessory, needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me."

We see here not only the epithet war applied to this strife, but its nature is revealed in the words Love and Hate, or Friendship and Strife. These were the principles which were taught as the origin of things in the Mysteries of Eleusis, the eternal War of Eleusis (vide "Banquet of Plato," cap. 14, p. 30). "For unity whilst it separates from itself identifies itself" (vide Creuzer's "Symbolik," vol. i. p. 199). Majian system :—"All things consist in the mixture of opposites ; disunion, difference gives existence to things. When this ceases, i.e., when the differences resolve into their source, so do they cease to exist."

This is the equivalent of *separation*¹ and of reconciliation. And it seems to us clearly to be the very basis of an art which is created for eternity and revelation. For the synthesis or marriage of philosophy (or ideas) to art is at once a separation and a reconciliation. It is the union of mind to matter, of the spiritual to the material, of the signification to the vehicle. Thus Creuzer tells us that "a grand doctrine of the Eleusinian (Mysteries) was the principle of War and Peace, of the strife of matter with the spirit, and of the purification of the latter through it. Thus the doctrine of separation and reconciliation, which in the Pythagorean resembles dualism" (vol. iv. p. 387, ed. iv.). The war of such an art consists in the mixture of contraries. For the material outer form of such art is clearly at enmity, as an obscuring and veiling garb of the inner spiritual signification.

But it is not only in this sense that we would apply it. We find that a great number of the plays turn upon separation and final reconciliation in a most phenomenal and striking manner. For example, The Winter's Tale presents us with a structure that turns upon the separation of Hermione and Leontes as a pivot, and closes with their reconciliation or unity. Pericles discloses an identical substructure with other prominent parallels that are too persistent to be accidental. In Pericles we have, as in The Winter's Tale, a lost child, who is the means of bringing about the reunion of father and mother. Marina is the counterpart of Perdita. Hermione and Thaisa, separated from their respective husbands, are both presented as supposed to be dead, and both miraculously return to life, and are rejoined to their husbands through the indirect instrumentality of their lost children. Again, in All's Well that Ends Well we have the separation of Helena and Bertram as the main plot of Love on one side, Hate on the other, to be followed by their reconciliation. In this play the poet actually brings in these contraries or opposites into the text, and evidently intentionally.

¹ "Let me confess that we two must be twain,
Although our undivided loves are one:
So shall those faults that do with me remain,
Without thy help, by me be borne alone."

Helena says of Bertram :—

“ His humble ambition, proud humility,
His jarring concord, and his discord dulcet,
His faith his sweet disaster.”

The entire plot of Romeo and Juliet is Love at civil war, at cross purposes, with Hate. The lovers are separated to such a degree in life by the family feud that they can only be united in death. It is impossible that these reiterated and prominent principles can be thus brought in by chance.

In the Two Noble Kinsmen, a play attributed to Shakespeare, we find these principles not only brought forward in the protagonist characters of Palamon and Arcite, but we have the introduction of the altars of Mars and Venus, who were the representative deities of these principles.

Again, in Hermione, which is only another name for Harmonia, we have a direct reference to Mars and Venus (or this Strife and Friendship), for she was the daughter of Mars and Venus.

To the general reader it may appear absurd or trifling to assert, that out of “Love and Hate” we can trace deliberate philosophic creative principles. But it must not be forgotten that these terms embrace the universe. In Love we have the great attractive force—Gravitation. In Hate we have its direct opposite—Repulsion, which it is not improper to connote with heat. These two are centripetal and centrifugal—a unifying and a separating power. The act of creation, whether physical or poetical, is a love force, synthetic or attractive, marrying for the sake of offspring. The poet marries his ideas to his vehicle. Love, according to the Orphic poets, was the gravitating or attractive principle, which brought the universe into shape and gave birth to the starry spheres. But the other power, the opposite of Love, was necessary to prevent everything unifying or marrying. The entire solar system keeps its allotted round through attraction and repulsion—Love and Hate.

We are not making imaginary parallels, or stretching a fanciful analogy to breaking point. Call attraction, gravity (or by any term of Newton's you like), it is simply Love, Desire, the force that compels one thing to another, whether it be particle to particle, or man to woman. And it is this power (which is a marrying or synthetic act), that Plato terms "marriage for the sake of immortality." It is the opening theme of the Sonnets. But it must not be taken alone, it must be coupled at the same time with its opposite, "strife," or war, or hate. For in art this latter is the obscuring matrix or form, which, whilst receiving the imprint of the archetypal ideas, transforms them into sensuous objects or pictures, and is at cross purposes with them as external to internal, or object to subject. These two in action with each other exemplify Nature as Strife and Friendship, for, as Heraclitus declares, "War is the father of all things." These principles run through all nature, and we call their balance moderation or temperance. In politics we see them displayed in the reciprocal play of party against party. No one thing exists in nature alone, but it has its direct opposite to balance it, and it is easy to maintain without fear of denial that out of the conflict of a great dualism, things exist. Can this be applied to art? We think so. And the plays, with their planned rebirth, will illustrate it.

It is worthy of a second notice to remark that we have this war described as "a civil war" (Sonnet 35)—

"Such civil war is in my love and hate
That I am accessory needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me."

Now we have here a confession, that the poet takes part against himself in this private warfare. He tells us again in Sonnet 46—

"Mine eye and heart are at a mortal war
How to divide the conquest of thy sight ;
My eye my heart thy picture's sight would bar,
My heart mine eye the freedom of that right.
My heart doth plead, that thou in him doth lie,
(A closet never pierced with crystal eyes),
But the defendant doth that plea deny,
And says in him thy fair appearance lies.

To 'cide this title is impaneled
 A quest of thoughts all tenants to the heart ;
 And by their verdict is determined
 The clear eye's moiety and the dear heart's part :
 As thus : mine eye's due is thy outward part,
 And my heart's right thy inward love of heart."

We see here very unmistakably that this "mortal war," or "civil war," is connected with an "outward" and an "inward" part, that belong respectively to the eye, and to something that is secret, interior, and obscured by the outward eye. This is a species of perspective or illusion produced by exquisite art. Let us hear the poet upon this wonderful art :—

"Perspective it is best painter's art,
 For through the painter must you see his skill,"

which (being paraphrased) declares "perspective" to be only ("best") a trick of art, and if we desire to judge of the painter's skill or excellence, we must see through the "perspective."¹ That the poet employs the term "perspective" in the sense of illusion is clear in Twelfth Night, where we have Viola and Sebastian so alike that they are "A natural perspective, that is and is not." But suppose we summon the real author to our assistance—Francis Bacon, who appears as if he had written his prose works as commentaries, explanations, and keys to his other poetical creations. In the "Natural History" (Century i 98) we find : "Like perspectives which show things inwards when they are but paintings." In the "Advancement of Learning," we have—

"Poetry is nothing else but feigned history."

In Twelfth Night, Act i. sc. 2, we have—

"Viola. 'Tis poetical.

Olivia. It is the more likely to be feigned."

In As You Like It, Act iii. sc. 7—

“The truest poetry is the most feigning.”

Or Richard II., Act ii. sc. 2—

“Like perspectives, which, rightly gazed upon,
Show nothing but confusion—ey’d awry,
Distinguish form.”

What does the poet mean by “rightly gazed upon,” unless he means in the “right or usual way”? Yet this shows nothing but confusion! There are certain pictures with figures in them that do not appear when we gaze rightly or simply, or in the usual way at them.

To find a face in a tree, or a figure in a landscape, must be a familiar form of amusement, in pictorial invention, to everybody. In order to get at the secret, we have to twist and screw the picture about, and in the words of the poet, “ey’d awry;” we “distinguish form,” that is, we arrive at the solution or discovery. It is so with allegory, and with all high art requiring intense study to reveal its spiritual archetypal idea or form. Thus we have the poet telling us in Richard II., that “perspective” produces confusion when rightly gazed upon. Dante writes, in his Convito—

so that the author of the plays is only using, after all, an established form of secret language, and we cannot be charged with foisting fanciful theories of our own upon the text. Rossetti, in his “History of the Antipapal Spirit which preceded the Reformation,” gives us an elaborate account of the mystic language which he terms the “Gay Science,” which we quote:—

“The mystic language of this society was taught by means of a vocabulary, called the Grammar of the Gay Science; founded chiefly on ideas and words put in opposition to each other. The antithesis of gay science was sad ignorance; and, hence, to be gay and to be sad, to laugh, and to weep, with all their respective synonyms and derivatives, signified to be a sectarian, or to be, on the contrary, a papalist. Heart meant the hidden secret; face the outward meaning; and sighs the verses in this jargon, &c.

“Before Dante lived, this gay science had fixed the foundation of its language on the two words, love and hatred; and all their attendant qualities followed on each side—pleasure and grief, truth and falsehood, light and darkness, sun and moon, life and death, good and evil, virtue and vice, courage and cowardice, mountain and valley, fire and frost, garden and desert, &c.”

Nor should we be surprised to find the author of the plays employing the same secret language as Dante, inasmuch as we have a very strong hint thrown out to us in Sonnet 86 that Dante inspired the poet first.

“Was it the proud full sail of his great verse,
Bound for the prize of all too-precious you,
That did my ripe thoughts in my brain inhearse,
Making their tomb the womb wherein they grew?”

The expression of “proud full sail” can only be applied to Dante (or Virgil), inasmuch as we find him comparing his great work to a ship.

“The ‘Purgatorio’ opens with the metaphor of Dante’s poetic bark, or sail—a simile continued in the ‘Paradiso’ (canto ii, 1)— “PURGATORIO—CANTO I.

“O’er the smooth waters of a milder sea
The light bark of my genius hoists her sail,
Leaving behind the flood of misery :
For now that second kingdom claims my song,
Wherein is purified the spirit frail,
And fitted to rejoin the heavenly throng.”

—Wright’s Translation.

In Sonnet 80 we find the author of the plays comparing his “saucy bark” to another poet’s—

“My saucy bark inferior far to his,
On your broad main doth wilfully appear.”

We find Dante making Beatrice the Admiral who commands his figurative bark—

“ As to the prow or stern, some admiral
 Paces the deck, inspiriting his crew,
 When 'mid the sail-yards all hands ply aloof ;
 Thus on the left side of the car, I saw
 The virgin stationed, who before appear'd.”
 —(“Purg.” 30.)

We cannot too sufficiently study the creative principles consisting of a Loved One or Beloved, as we find so repeatedly in the Sonnets.

Analysing Brahma, we find Creuzer thus describes him—

- (a.) The first Being before and over all things.
- (b.) The Love that the first Being has for himself, and which he gives away.
- (c.) Consequently God divided into a Lover and a Beloved.
- (d.) This Separation is the primal origin of Things.

Not only do the Sonnets deal almost exclusively with a Lover and a Beloved as alter ego (whom the poet repeatedly tells us is himself), but the separation, which is the primal origin of things, is distinctly enunciated. The poet must beget an heir, a son—who is his Beloved, his spiritual archetype or wisdom—which shall be wedded to his art, and be reborn by revelation of that art. So we find the opening theme deals with marriage for the sake of immortality. And by this we believe he means the marriage of pure rationalistic thought to a vehicle which shall at the same time veil and carry it, as dual unity. We find this “union in partition” plainly enunciated in the poem of the Phoenix and Turtle :—

“ So they lov'd, as love in twain
 Had the essence but in one :
 Two distincts, division none :
 Number there in love was slain.

 Property was thus appall'd,
 That the self was not the same ;
 Single nature's double name
 Neither two nor one was call'd.

Reason, in itself confounded,
Saw division grow together,
To themselves yet either-neither,
Simple were so well compounded.

That it cried, How true a twain
Seemeth this concordant one !
Love hath reason, reason none,
If what parts can so remain."

We find it again brought forward in the relationship of Hermia to Helena :—

" We, Hermia, like two artificial gods,
Have with our needs created both one flower,
Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key ;
As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds,
Had been incorporate. So we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted ;
But yet a union in partition,
Two lovely berries moulded on one stem ;
So, with two seeming bodies, but one heart ;
Two of the first, like coats in heraldry,
Due but to one, and crownèd with one crest."

Hermia is plainly the Hermetic ideas imprinted upon Helena, as a stamp imprints itself upon wax. This is Plato's simile for the participation of ideas with Matter (Parmenides).

Fouillée writes (La Philosophie de Platon) :—

"Les Pythagoriciens représentaient le sensible comme une imitation, μιμησις, de l'intelligible. Cette image se retrouve souvent dans Platon. Le Timée, dont le héros est un pythagoricien, appelle l'ensemble des Idées ou monde intelligible le modèle du monde sensible. L'éternel artiste, les yeux fixés sur cet exemplaire, le reproduit en façonnant la matière à l'image des Idées. Dans un autre passage du Timée, la matière est représentée comme recevant l'empreinte des Idées, de même que la cire reçoit une forme sous la main qui la pétrit. La République appelle les objets sensibles les reflets, les ombres, les images du monde intelligible."

But here is the conclusive proof. The poet uses the same simile in the Dream :—

“The. What say you, Hermia? be advis'd, fair maid :
 To you, your father should be as a god ;
One that compos'd your beauties ; yea, and one
 To whom you are but as a form in wax,
By him imprinted, and within his power
 To leave the figure, or disfigure it.”

Here we have the same metaphor. And the comparison of Hermia's father with a god who “compos'd her beauties” is a proof of the nature of the relationship of Hermia to Helena, that is, of the spiritual to the phenomenal, of the idea to the form, of mind to matter. But the entire play is a proof of it, the mistakes in the wood arising from the likeness of Hermia to Helena, for we cannot recognise Hermia until we can exclaim—

“*Transparent*¹ Helena ! Nature here shows Art
 That through thy bosom makes me see thy heart.”

This heart is the secret Hermia. For the poet has told us,—that his inward side is his heart side :—

“As thus ; mine eye's due is thine outward part,
 And my heart's right thine inward love of heart.”

This is the Templar language or jargon of the gay science which we have already quoted from Dante—where Heart means the hidden secret. Hermia and Helena have “but one heart ;” as the poet tells us, “they grew in the act of creation together,” like to a double cherry, seeming parted, but yet “a union in partition.” This is nothing else but—

“So they lov'd, as love in twain
 Had the essence but in one ;
 Two distincts, division none ;
 Number there in love was slain.”

Love is the synthetic or marrying power of creation, whereby two are identified into one. And this is the key of the ¹ This simile is borrowed from the Mysteries or the Gate of Horn, through which transparent substance the real, spiritual ideas or visions were apprehended. See page 211.

Sonnets, marriage for the sake of the immortality, which such perfect art is sure to bring in the rebirth or discovery of the ideas married (and buried) in such art. This is why Love plays such an important part in the Sonnets. For Love, in the Platonic sense, is the creative power by which two things are married and made one. Thus the entire proposition of marriage, set forth in the opening of the Sonnets, is this idea of creation, for the sake of rebirth or revelation. If the poet copies a copy (like almost all other art in existence), his art will not be immortal in the sense he aims at. For phenomena are already images, or idols of spiritual ideas. He must therefore copy not things, but ideas, and imprint them upon his creations in the widest philosophic sense possible, so will his plays become philosophic play systems, which indeed they are with a vengeance. We see at once that such a sublime scheme as this, seemingly impossible, is not only Godlike, but is something almost superhuman. We see also that it makes the characters of the plays, idols representative of ideas, whereby the entire Baconian theory of words, as "Pygmalion's images," as idols of the theatre, may be brought in to illustrate his inductive method, and his idols with their four classes particularly. This art will never be understood until Plato's similes to represent the relationship of ideas to phenomena or matter are thoroughly grasped. That is, that phenomena are images, idols, shadows, reflections of the ideas stamped upon them, as a die or seal imprints its picture upon wax. The terms he uses express this in the simplest and plainest way possible. We are told upon the monument at Stratford that the poet has the genius of Socrates and the art of Virgil! What more do we want, considering it is written everywhere in the Sonnets, over and over again? As a Dream is the reflection of something real, as a Shadow is to the light, so does the play of the Midsummer-Night's Dream deal with this very subject of the poet's art and its creative principles, being self-reflective, in irony picturing the cross-purposes, mistakes, and illusions which arise from our mistaking Helena for Hermia—the spiritual for the phenomenal. But whilst applying to itself, it applies to Nature also. And this is the miracle of this art, which the World must awake to realize, that it has risen to an equal point of height with Nature, and what it reflects of itself, it reflects always doubly—to Nature at the same time also.

CHAPTER X.

"Three problems are put by nature to the mind: What is matter? Whence is it? and whereto? The first of these questions only, the ideal theory answers. Idealism saith: matter is a phenomenon, not a substance. Idealism acquaints us with the total disparity between the evidence of our own being, and the evidence of the world's being. The one is perfect; the other incapable of any assurance; the mind is a part of the nature of things; the world is a divine dream, from which we may presently awake to the glories and certainties of day."—(Essays, "Spirit," p. 166, vol. ii., Emerson.)

IN the play of The Tempest, we have (in the speech of Prospero, which he introduces in connection with the Masque) an epitome of the poet's philosophical creed or way of looking at life, which it is impossible to misconstrue. In the words, "We are such stuff as dreams are made on," and again, "Our little life is rounded with a sleep," we are face to face with the doctrines taught in the Mysteries, and repeated in the Platonic philosophy. With Plato, life is a dream, objects are phenomena, shadows, or images, and we are nearest awakening from the sleep of life when we dream that we are dreaming! The Greeks called Sleep the lesser Mystery, and Death the greater Mystery, the parallel between Death and his twin brother Sleep, holding out as it were the promise of immortality—another wakening in another world! The entire doctrine of Idealism is founded upon the priority, and real character, of the Rational and Spiritual over the Irrational and Phenomenal. We must reverse common sense if we would understand this philosophy. For it asserts sense to be the Apparent and illusive—not a lie, but a half or false truth, in fact symbolical, and as Emerson would say, representative.

¹ This chapter is only a brief summary of what has been already discussed at greater length in "A New Study of Shakespeare."

Let it be here noted, that this is a philosophy of Art. It is par excellence the poet's philosophy. Because it asserts the entire world is a Divine poem—composed by a Divine Poet or Creator, who like an Artist conceives a beautiful archetypal Idea, and clothes it in the vehicle of Nature, and of Man. The Drama of Existence is to God, what the plays are to the author. And we see at once that it is perfectly possible for Dramatic Art to embrace this philosophy and be god-like from this point of view. For the entire Drama may become a means of phenomenal representation, giving and withholding its meaning, concealing and revealing it, after the fashion of Nature itself. And this is what, we are very certain, the author of the plays has done, viz., embraced the entire Platonic philosophy, or rather, we should say, its fountain head, in the Mysteries of Eleusis, with the origins of the Drama. Life is a dream,—the masque vanishes,—these our actors are melted into thin air. But is there not, perhaps, a lesson still waiting for us to learn? Is it not possible, nay, probable, that the other actors in these plays are shadows, images, reflections also? But let us examine more closely this creed of Idealism as taught by the Ancients.

Now it is significant for a study of the Midsummer-Night's Dream, that we have been finding the poet pronouncing in The Tempest, that life is a dream, and our life a sleep. This is word for word the teaching of the Eleusinian Mysteries and of Socrates. On the poet's monument we find that he had the art of Virgil and the genius of Socrates. Considering that up to date, neither Virgil's art nor Socrates' have been found in the plays, it is sufficiently noteworthy to remark that Virgil and Socrates join hands upon the subject of the Mysteries. The VIth Book of Virgil, ever since Warburton pointed it out, has been accepted as a description of the Mysteries, and we know from Porphyry that the Platonic philosophy was taught in the Mysteries. With regard to this, we have no need of authorities. Any student reading the Banquet, and Diotima's instructions to Socrates related by the latter, will at once perceive that the subject is sacred, solemn, guardedly veiled, and that these are Divine Creative Doctrines pertaining to the Mysteries. What resemblance can there be otherwise between Epic poetry like Virgil's, and Dramatic plays like these? And where, indeed, do we find the Socratic philosophy? We reply, it is behind, imbedded, the framework—the archetypal conception of this entire art. It crops up in this speech, united with the apocalyptic vision or masque of Juno and Ceres, wherein for a moment we behold the other or Heavenly side of this art, revealed symbolically in a play, where we already are represented in relation to this art, as its initiates through time!

We elsewhere see that this philosophy, that life is a dream, produced by the sleep of sense, is not only the Socratic philosophy, but Bacon's also, who describes Socrates as "having drawn down philosophy from heaven." And we now propose to accept this statement seriously, and apply it to this play of the Midsummer-Night's Dream.

Dreams are the result of sleep—sleep of night. Moonlight is a dream of sunshine or daylight, as if the day were sick, and our earth-life a mere vision, by which we apprehend something more real, more lasting, and more sublime than the errors and cross purposes with which our mortal eyes are blinded. In The Tempest we have the Heaven of this art displayed or opened to us. Is there no antithesis to this in the Midsummer-Night's Dream? Can it be possible that we have in this play the night-side, or reflected side, of the poet's art in relation to himself and to us, presented to us? In The Tempest we have an apocalyptic vision—a reconciliation—a gradual revelation—the god in art, breaking his wand and disclaiming his magic; deigning to be human and one of us. But in the Dream all is confined to Night and to Moonlight; all is reflected, all is shadow, image, illusive, phenomenal, and dream-like. How the parallel insists itself upon us that we are still gropers in the Moonlight of his Divine Theatre, at cross purposes with his secret meaning, confused by his phenomenal beauty, and taking this actual moonlight for daylight—the reflected and phenomenal for the real and spiritual! Whilst many are questioning themselves, whether some of the plays have not an inner or deeper philosophic structure than is generally surmised, the plays are mockingly reflecting our relationship to them.

If, as we believe, the entire system of this art revolves around a spiritual sun, and is a complete solar system, we can quite understand the philosophical relationship obtaining between the plays and their creator, contemplating the moonlight of his art (or its night-side), whilst the great solar Truths, which are its logos, soul, archetypal source and centre, are unrevealed to us except by reflection, that is, by idols of the Theatre, by phenomena. Let us study the Dream with such a theory before us.

It will be granted that things in this universe exist and live through opposition and conflict. We see this in the two great laws of Attraction and Repulsion, which might be termed cold and heat. We call them Centripetal and Centrifugal—sometimes but rarely, Love and Hate, though this is no strained or fanciful parallel. We may boldly declare (for our own belief) that these two laws govern the universe, the planets being kept in their spheres by them. It is the balance, or rather the play of these mutually self-controlling forces which governs the entire solar system. When we study the ancient Orphic Hymns and find Love playing a great creative part, we need not be surprised, for it is only a name for Gravity or Attraction. In the senses, we find Love or desire to be another term again for attraction,—an attraction that is quite at war or conflict with our rational faculties. And to such an extent is this accepted, that Love has, in consideration of his irrationality, been considered blind. We shall find that the cross purposes and errors produced by Puck in the Dream are caused by a double conflict of two principles, which are Love and Hate. We are going to propose that these are creative art principles, at once rational and irrational—rational in the undoing, irrational in the making or synthesis.

We desire to propose to the philosophical student of this play the following theory:—First, that the play is a reflection of the Night side of Nature (or of the poet's art), dealing with its phenomenal side as at cross purposes with its Hermetic and Spiritual side. Directly we open the play we find Hermia at cross purposes with her father, in love with Lysander, but forced to marry with Demetrius. We find her name strangely supporting the theory we are about to propound. For the name of Hermia immediately suggests the Hermetic, the interpretation of things or ideas requiring interpretation. Plato compares the imprinting of ideas upon matter as the stamp of a die upon wax. We find the text actually employing this comparison. Nor does the parallel stop here. Her father is compared to a god—a significant fact, when we are proposing to deal with Creation Divine and poetic. It is in the choice of names, in the etymology of the plays, that we shall find their solution:—

“Theseus. What say you, Hermia? be advised, fair maid :
 To you your father should be as a god ;
 One that composed your beauties ; yea and one
 To whom you are a form in wax
 By him imprinted.”

The student of Plato will immediately recognize the source of the imagery. Everywhere Plato conceives the creative power as imprinting his archetypal ideas on matter, as a form on wax. Let us then assume that Hermia is a personified embodiment of the archetypal ideas, concealed hermetically in Nature or this art. Grant this for the sake of what is to follow. Now all ideas, whether (philosophical) as unity or separate, require interpretation, a setting free. Marriage is synthesis, that is, identification, harmony. Love is attraction. As Dante says, Lovers are those who in the rational world identify by harmony or marriage what they find in themselves, and in objects. It will be granted that all things in these plays, if resembling at all Nature, are symbolical. That is, there is an objective and a subjective side to everything, either separately or universally. The entire universe is both irrational (and sensual), and rational (or spiritual) at the same time—both are at conflict, as concealing and revealing powers. The mind is always at work interpreting, discovering philosophically, or scientifically, the rational side of things—(the Hermetic secrets of Nature),—which may be rightly called the symbolical or subjective side of existence, as ideas. Now the Subject is never separate, but always existing in dual unity with the Object World. This Object World, whether phenomena (or the plays as they stand unrevealed), we beg leave to term Helena—a name which suggests beauty, and Matter, as we abundantly find. If Hermia and Helena are the two sides of this medal of Jove, they ought to be one, though really two, according as we take them subjectively or objectively. To make a somewhat abstruse subject clear, let us take any myth, fable, or story which contains a meaning to it, or an allegorical picture.

Every fellow of Freemasonry knows that the signs he is shown have a meaning. The square, the compasses are to him emblematic of more than they are to a carpenter. So with things and so with Nature. For everything speaks a double language of art and revelation, of ideas and sense at once. Yet these separate two (sign and meaning) are one, until separated by thought—the sign only carries the idea, the idea gives birth to the sign, according to Plato. For that is the Divine Art. Now to apply this to the play and to Nature. In ourselves we find also this double power,—ability to interpret, to analyze or set free, or reveal what we understand, and in default of this—perception of the object, as existing to the senses. Thus in Objective Nature (and Art) there are two identical (seemingly) yet separate sides, one appealing to æsthetic, the other to the rational faculties. On the other hand, the perceiver, Man, is irrationally drawn towards objects through attraction or Love, sometimes sensuously, sometimes rationally. We have thus FOUR PROTAGONISTS of the purely irrational and rational faculties. Two are out of us in the outside world. Two are within us. The whole of our relationship to Nature is a conflict and confusion arising from this antinomy. For existence is of this nature, that they are at cross purposes with each other. Philosophy has been termed the undoing or reversal of common sense. To think deeply or profoundly we must veil the outward sight—ignore it, and undo what our outward senses assert as true.

The sun rises apparently in the east (so say our eyes) and sets in the west, moves across the heavens, yet it is an illusion of the senses produced by the diurnal movement of the earth. And so on. We would all marry Hermia, if we were not crossed by Demetrius. For the earth-life (called Demetrians) is at war with our rational interpreting faculties—Lysander. The senses are the rivals of the soul. But let us summon the text. We assert that Hermia is a form imprinted on wax—Helena, as archetypal ideas (and therefore concealed or Hermetic) are stamped on a vehicle, as art or beauty of Nature—plays otherwise. Now this relationship of Helena to Hermia is insisted upon in the text in unmistakable fashion. This identity yet separation is a union in partition.¹

“ We, Hermia, like two artificial gods,
Have with our needles created both one flower,
Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key,
As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds
Had been incorporate ; so we grew together
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet an union in partition.”

This is creation divine or poetic, which we find again in the Phoenix and the Turtle. It is the keynote of the entire art of these plays, which are as profound as Nature itself. These two, Helena and Hermia, are incorporate, “ a union in partition,” the plays exterius or interius, accordingly as we take them.

Now comes our explanation to those who may deem it worth particular study. It is this. The confusion, errors, and cross purposes in the play are due to the identity yet separation of Hermia from Helena ; both are confounded. First we love Helena, then Hermia, for they can only be separated in thought. Let us be clear. This art, according to our theory, is equally applicable to Nature or to itself. For this is its exhaustive miracle, that whatever applies to itself applies to Nature also, for it is a complete parallel, with an external side as embodiment of its spiritual side. Laugh as the world may, it will be found so; not because we say so, but because it is so. And could we by our pen get others to see what we know and see, the world would and must see it is so. For three hundred years we have been Demetrians seeking Hermia in Helena only—though unknowingly to us the features of Hermia are imprinted on the features of Helena. What we mean is this in plain language: The real power, fascination, depth and charm of the plays, hitherto known under the false name of Shakespeare, is derived from the spiritual side, which we are as yet unable to recognise, except as a nameless attraction to the external side Helena. Whilst we are wooing Helena, we are in reality in love with Hermia. We feel the Hermetic in this art; for it is the real force which lifts it above all other art, and places it on a pedestal inscribed to Nature, who, as the monumental inscription states, died when it was born, but which means in this case, that until the summer of its rebirth returns, it is in the Winter signs, and like its protagonist Ceres, awaiting (like Hermione) its lost child—the Spring of its revelation or new birth!

The errors and cross purposes of our study of this art are as much the result of our own natures as of the perplexing dual character of the plays or Nature. Our intellectual faculties and our earth life (which we owe to Deméter, and which makes us Demetrians), are always at cross purposes, for the creative love in these plays has made us blind to the rational and spiritual in it. It is Puck (who like Ariel, is a creative instrument), who as Love, blindness, has with his creative tricks of the poet's imagination, squeezed the love juice of his art on our eyes, so that we are for the night of the misinterpretation of these plays blind to the Hermetic in this art.

Theseus.

Directly we hear the name of Theseus we recall the picture of Virgil, where we see him seated in the infernal regions:—

“Sedet, æternumque sedebit, Infelix Theseus.”

Now, there is a curious passage in the Dream which pictures Theseus as suffering torture. Theseus says:—

“Is there no play
To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?”

Theseus and Pirithous we know were placed by Pluto upon an enchanted rock at the gate of Hell or Tartarus. Theseus is connected with the labyrinth and the Minotaur, both of which are well known to have represented the labyrinth of existence, and of the soul immersed in matter. By the labyrinth we have suggestion of the tortuous and crooked ways, cross purposes and errors, of the soul; and, indeed, we know that some of these underground labyrinths were places of initiation, of symbolical death, and thus of the other side, or night side of the soul, as related to the other world. The descent of Theseus into Hell is on a level with that of Æneas, or of Orpheus, who is said to have instituted the Mysteries. When we study the play of the Dream closely, we find not only distinct resemblances to Virgil's sixth book, but something more than a startling resemblance of the transformation of Bottom into an Ass, to the like transformation of Apuleius, from which it is undoubtedly taken, in the “Golden Ass.”

Moonlight.

We find the ancients contemplating and holding the Moon (and Moonlight, of course) as the self-reflecting image of Nature. At first sight this may seem a little strange and extravagant, but a very little study reveals the sublimity of the idea. In the first place, Moonlight is borrowed or false light. The light of the moon is the reflected light of the sun, while the sun is quite invisible to us. And to the philosophical mind there is a like parallel obtaining between phenomena and their real signification or ideas, inasmuch as the former are but reflections of the latter,¹ whilst invisible to us. This, of course, is the Platonic philosophy, which is best presented to us in the allegory of the subterranean cavern in the seventh book of the "Republic." In this world we dwell on the night side of existence. All that we see are but symbols (produced by the senses) of things spiritual and invisible to us except by inference or conjecture. As different as daylight is to moonlight, as different is the night side of the senses to the sunlight of internal vision and truth. Everything in this world exists by contrast, by opposition, by dual unity, for everything has a meaning, and everything has an appearance, which is at war with it to obscure and hide it at once.

This is Nature's great art,—illusion of the senses; and the ancients were profoundly right when they made the veiling of the sight or outward eye the preliminary process towards inward vision. The mind's eye is not the outward eye, but the soul's eye—the eye of the invisible and spiritual.

To those who deny a subjective, philosophical side (or any justification for the construction of the plays at all), we would ask why the poet has introduced a mythical classical element into the Dream, side by side with the rude mechanicals and their modern names? Such plays as these plays are half divine, and are not made in sport, as worlds without meaning, but are as philosophical as the universe itself, as profound as existence, full of the minutest symbolic meaning, planned and constructed to teach divine truths of the highest order, and not mere playthings for the theatre. But the World will not take the trouble to think, and must have opinions. Nor will the World consent to any instruction upon the matter, inasmuch as they know all about it. And are as positive and conceited as Bottom to hold up their lantern and bush of thorns in self-sufficient reflection of all that this art contains. Now, will any one propose seriously that it was "heads or tails" whether the poet introduced Theseus or any other mythical hero? This being the case, we beg to call attention to the fact that Theseus is presented to us by Virgil as seated in the infernal regions.

The introduction of the interlude in this play immediately finds its parallel in Hamlet. And it is well worthy attention that in the last-named play, the intention of the poet is to hold up the mirror of reflection to the King's conscience—in short, that the introduction of the play within the play is to reflect the crime upon which the larger play revolves, and thus to play the part of conscience on one side and reflection on the other. It is, therefore, probable that the interlude in the Midsummer-Night's Dream has a similar relationship to the entire play, as a miniature copy has to its original in the sense of caricature of incapacity. And this (perhaps to some strange theory) is borne out by certain parodied resemblances obtaining between the play itself and the interlude, which we shall point out.

In the first place, the most significant fact in the Dream is that it is laid entirely by night. There is even in the title something to enforce our particular attention to this point, inasmuch as the play deals with confusion, error, cross-purposes, and blindness, which are companions of darkness and dreams. All this confusion could not have found a fitting framework or background by daylight; so that we perceive a sort of harmony obtains between the title as a Dream, and the action as one of errors and confusion. Night is the producer and causer of these cross-purposes.

The most prominent feature in the setting of the play is the background of Moonlight and Woods (or Nature), which seem to serve as framework and main philosophical idea in the construction of it. And it is still more significant that, in the ridiculous interlude, we have the introduction of a lantern and a bush of thorns to present Moonshine and Woods, showing that this play within the play is, as in the case of Hamlet, a reflection of the larger play or action; though, of course, in this case, only as a parody or caricature of infinite, immeasurable incapacity and distance. The transformation of Bottom into an Ass presents us with the ne plus ultra point of this caricature. So that we seem to have here a portrait, perhaps, of Man in relation to Nature, if not also to the plays themselves.

Bacon writes:—"But in the mean while let him remember that I am in pursuit, as I said at first, not of beauty but of utility and truth: and let him withal call to mind the ancient parable of the two gates of sleep:—

'Sunt geminæ Somni portæ, quarum altera fertur
Cornea, qua veris facilis datur exitus umbris;
Altera candenti perfecta nitens elephanto,
Sed falsa ad cælum mittunt insomnia Manes.'¹

"Great no doubt is the magnificence of the ivory gate, but the true dreams pass through the gate of horn."

Now, it is very interesting to study Bacon's profound knowledge and thorough apprehension of Virgil's recondite meaning connected with the Mysteries. We see that horn is a transparent substance, and it is not through this gate that Æneas is ushered out of the lower regions into the real world again, but through the gate of ivory. Æneas has been initiated, and he returns to the world again.

"His ubi tum natum Anchises unaque, Sibyllam Prosequitur-dictis, *porta*que emittit eburna."

This shows very clearly that the false dreams were connected in the Mysteries with life—that is, with phenomenal and material nature or the senses. The real dreams have been seen in the initiation below, because the whole end and aim of the Mysteries was to teach man the reality of the (future life, and of Idealism. The spiritual was taught to be the only true, and this could only be apprehended by those who could penetrate the opaque masque of delusion called matter, and see beyond to the other side, as through horn.² But this is proved by Sleep being called the lesser mysteries of Death. Euripides expresses it:—

"Two gates the entrance of Sleep's house adorn:
Of ivory one, the other simple horn;
Through horn a crowd of real visions streams,
Through ivory portals pass delusive dreams."

² In the words of Lysander to Helena (in the Dream), when he exclaims, "Transparent Helena," we find this horn alluded to as affording real vision.

ἮΙΝΟΣ τὰ ΜΙΚΡΑ τοῦ θανάτου ΜΥΣΤΗΡΙΑ
 "Sleep¹ is the lesser mystery of Death."

Whereby we see that what was meant was—that as Dreams seem to be real whilst they last, and inasmuch as we only discover their false nature with awakening (being thoroughly under their delusive influence), so life compared to the awakening after death, would prove but a dream also. This is proved by the greater Mysteries always embracing a symbolical death for the initiated. With the rebirth were taught heavenly things. The candidate had died figuratively, and had awakened from the sleep of life to realize that all he saw in life was but a dream. What sleep is to the morning's awakening (with which we realize the emptiness and unreality of all we have dreamt), Death is to the spiritual reawakening, whereby we see the unreality of existence and its shadowy nature. Sleep was thus the lesser or small analogy (Mystery) which illustrated the (greater) sleep of death. The ancients took their analogies from nature. They saw that things repeat themselves on a lesser and larger scale. The analogy between sleep and death is striking—(these twin brothers)—and from the one they concluded another awakening of the soul. Thus idealism was taught in these initiations. They taught that life was a dream and the earth life a species of sleep, which we find repeated in the speech of Prospero in The Tempest, for what he delivers there is only the teaching of the Mysteries:—

"We are such stuff as dreams are made of,
 And our little life is rounded with a sleep."

These doctrines were taught in the Temple of Ceres. And Prospero sums up his speech in connection with the masque where Ceres is introduced. Prospero is no doubt a representative Jupiter, and his speech we have quoted is but the summing up of Idealism. What do we mean by Idealism? We mean the philosophy that taught that life is a sleep, and phenomena dreams or shadows of the spiritual, which is the only real and true, and which pervades all things.

“Musæus, therefore, who had been hierophant at Athens, takes the place of the sibyl (as it was the custom to have different guides in different parts of the celebration) and is made to conduct him to the recess, where his father's shade opens to him the doctrine of truth, in these sublime words :—

‘Principio cœlum, ac terras, camposque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra
SPIRITUS INTUS ALIT, totamque infusa per artus
MENS agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.
Inde hominum pecudumque genus, vitæque volantum,
Et quæ marmoreo fert monstra sub æquore pontus.’

This was no other than the doctrine of the old Egyptians, as we are assured by Plato; who says they taught that Jupiter was the SPIRIT WHICH PERVADETH ALL THINGS.” (“Divine Legation,” Warburton.)

It is needless to fill these pages with quotations, which we could ad nauseam. The thing is so simple, Sleep the lesser Mystery, Death the greater! The one standing as the prototype to the other. Whatever therefore we see as awake is a dream, for we are (relatively to the spiritual) in a land of dreams, and thoroughly immersed in those dreams which seem true. But when we wake after the sleep of death, their true nature and unreality will appear, and does appear to the philosopher who is nearest awakening when he dreams that he dreams, as Novalis puts it. Warburton apprehends the matter in a very lame and indistinct fashion; and by a great many writers it is not apprehended at all. It is a thing which explains itself, and all the scholarship in the world will not shake the truth of what we have briefly summed up.

CHAPTER XI.

HAMLET.

LET it be noted that the purpose of the poet seems to have been to present us, in the characters of Polonius, Guildenstern, Rosencrantz, and Laertes (if not Osrice also), a succession of defences of the usurping King, who must be, and are all killed, or made away with, before the King himself can be arrived at with the end of the play. This, it seems to us, is a most significant hint. Because in each of these we see represented certain historical and, indeed, worldly characteristics, which are worth particular study in each case. Hamlet has often been criticised severely by writers upon his want of action. He broods, he reflects, but he is apparently lacking in character. But does he not act throughout the play? Does he not first hold up the image of truth to the conscience of usurping falsehood by means of the play introduced within the play? Does he not kill Polonius, outwit Guildenstern and Rosencrantz, and see through Osrice? Let us, then, ponder over the philosophical genius of Hamlet's character. For this character is one we see reflected in every man whose mental faculties outweigh his physical ones or his will. Nay, more, we see that it is an universal truth that can be applied collectively. For History, past and present, is full of parallels where thought, discovery, and, therefore, Right and Truth, are at war, but always in a minority, against established error, custom, and infallibility. The entire history of the human race might be writ large, King Falsewood, who has usurped the rightful heir, the Prince of Truth. This is the nature, indeed, of human existence.

If we now take Polonius, Guildenstern, Rosencrantz, and Laertes, we shall find that they, each of them, represent respectively much that we can everywhere find in History and mankind, as bulwarks, supports, or buttresses of Infallibility, Errors,—in short, the vested interests and ignorance that shut out Truth and light, and keep the Prince of Truth in a prison, though he is rightful heir and apparently free. We must remember that when Hamlet was written, Europe was a species of world prison. Struggles of religion, strangling of free thought, speech, or writing, were things of common evil then, we cannot imagine now. But in dealing with a subject of this kind, it is impossible to enter into particulars or details. The student who requires proof on such a subject would comprehend nothing of our argument. It is the nature of existence that Ignorance shall usurp Truth first, and Darkness precede Light. That being acknowledged, we have rather to study the particular touches of art, with which the poet has invested such characters as Polonius, Rosencrantz, and Guildenstern, all of whom are directly opposed and in conflict with Hamlet. Their part is to hedge the King, from Hamlet's revenge or (so-called) madness. Let us therefore take old Polonius first, as he stands next the King in authority, with his infallibility, empty words, and assurance that he knows everything, and I think it will be easy to show what he represents.

Polonius.

It requires very little adduced from the text to sum up Polonius. He is old, he is doting—he is not true, but although sure of finding Truth, “though it were hid indeed within the centre”—he is worldly wise, cunning, and full of bias. His speech to Reynaldo savours of Popish instructions to ensnare truth, rather than to unveil it.

“Pol.

See you now ;

Your bait of falsehood, takes this carp of truth ;
And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,
With windlances and with assay of bias,
By indirections find directions out.”

How cautious, how cunning, how worldly wise this is! The "bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth." Poor truth being a sort of silly fish, that is to be angled for, and asphyxiated by falsehood! Then what a vast sum of meaning is contained in the word bias, which means, force, violence, and against the will, and, in our reduced rendering of the term, prejudice! But that the Author means, force or violence, is plain by the association of the word with "windlances," which seems a sly hint for the rack, which really was a frame with windlances attached to draw the truth, or tortured truth, out of the unhappy victim! It is by "indirection," that is, by false ways and indirect ways, that the carp of truth is caught or stifled. And lo, five or six lines after this speech we have a fresh scene presented to us with Ophelia, who gives us the following portrait of Hamlet:—

Oph. My Lord, as I was sewing in my closet
 Lord Hamlet—with his doublet all unbraced;
 No hat upon his head; his stockings foul'd,
 Ungarter'd and down-gyved to his ancle;
 Pale as his shirt; his knees knocking each other;
 And with a look so piteous in purport,
As if he had been loosed out of hell,
To speak of horrors—he comes before me."

This is indeed a striking picture, of a man who has been put to the torture or question. We may depend upon it that the "windlances" and "assays of bias" or violence, of which Polonius has been giving instructions a few lines before, have been applied to Hamlet. Do we not see in this portrait, 'a man with "gyves" on (even on his ancles),—"pale as his shirt," with knees trembling from the agonies of Hell of the windlances—the Rack? But who is Ophelia? Is she not the daughter of Polonius—the child of Tradition—of repetition of infallible dogmas—of certainty—of a dotard past? We must not confound her with Polonius. It is for the love of the beautiful and true, for the truth's sake that man has been tortured, has suffered, and has died. But as the daughter of Polonius, as the Roman Catholic Church was three and four centuries ago, it was the rack and torture to inspect her too closely—it was madness to do so—Hamlet's madness!

“Oph. He took me by the wrist and held me hard ;
Then goes he to the length of all his arm ;
And with his other hand, thus o'er his brow,
He falls to such perusal of my face,
As he would draw it.”

This picture is a portrait of inspection, scrutiny, criticism. It was such a searching examination that Luther gave the Church, and that led to the Reformation. Hamlet is thinking, reflecting, doubting, examining Ophelia critically. He is supposed to be mad. But madness is the term of reproach which is ever hurled at those who dare to examine old and established truths, and we need not dwell upon it. History is full of it; “his madness is poor Hamlet's¹ enemy.” But what has led Hamlet to this scrutiny (allied to the rashness of madness) of Ophelia? It is his father's ghost (the spiritual in him), which tells him that Truth has been supplanted by Falsehood, that a corrupt Church has become the usurper of a true religion, by pouring falsehood into the ears² of a sleeping and unawakened world, until that poison of falsehood triumphs and reigns in the stead of the murdered man.

We find Hamlet writing to Ophelia :

“To the celestial and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia.”

Let us study the expressions here used. Why “celestial,” why “beautified”? Have we not in these terms a hint of heaven, of the soul (“my soul's idol”); and mark, in a beautified Ophelia, not a beautiful one, but one who is got up, or made so by art alone? Polonius objects to the phrase—

“Pol. That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase ;
Beautified is a vile phrase.”

² “Porches of Life and Death,” by Bacon. Compare (Ghost's account of his death)—

“And in the porches of mine ears did pour
The leperous distilment.”

Why does he object to this phrase? It seems to us he is objecting to the term as implying "not true," in the sense of false, for a "beautified" object implies art and not nature. And it is indeed curious that the context preceding this speech is as follows:—

Pol. My liege, and madam, to expostulate
 What majesty should be, what duty is,
 Why day is day, night, night, and time is time,
 Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.
 Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,
 And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
 I will be brief: Your noble son is mad:
 Mad call I it: for, to define true madness,
 What is 't, but to be nothing else but mad.
 But let that go.

Queen. More matter, with less art.

Pol. Madam, I swear, I use no art at all.
 That he is mad, 't is true: 't is true, 't is pity;
 And pity 't is, 't is true: a foolish figure;
 But farewell it, for I will use no art.
 Mad let us grant him then: and now remains,
 That we find out the cause of this effect;
 Or, rather say, the cause of this defect;
 For this effect, defective, comes by cause:
 Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
 Perpend.
 I have a daughter; have, whilst she is mine;
 Who, in her duty and obedience, mark,
 Hath given me this: Now gather, and surmise.
 —'To the celestial, and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia,'—
 That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase; beautified is a vile phrase; but you shall hear.

'These. In her excellent white bosom, these.'

Queen. Came this from Hamlet to her?

Pol. Good madam, stay awhile; I will be faithful.

'Doubt thou, the stars are fire;¹

Doubt, that the sun doth move;

¹ Bacon held that the sun and stars are true fires (Works, v. 533-8), which we find repeated elsewhere (Cor. i. 4, 39; v. 4, 46; Jul. Cæs. iii. 7, 64, &c.). It is exactly a doubt upon this matter which Hamlet attributes to Ophelia, and for which Bruno and others were put to the stake, or tortured.

Doubt truth to be a liar ;
But never doubt, I love.

O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers ; I have not art to reckon my groans : but that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. Adieu.

Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst
this machine is to him, Hamlet.' ”

In this speech, where the Queen says to Polonius, “ more matter with less art,” we have a pretty epitome of the Catholic Church in those days ; that is, very “ little matter ” as regards Truth, and a very great deal of art ! Polonius sums himself up as a Wind-bag, one who gives reasons for nothing, but repeats his words, his dogmas, his creeds or beliefs, without giving explanation or satisfaction. Whilst denying that he uses art, he employs it to evade and burk the question of Hamlet's madness. And mark, he has a daughter, but she is only his whilst she is his,—that is, obedient and docile.

If we study Hamlet's letter to Ophelia, we find that his love for her is conditional on the “ machine ” or rack, and that whilst upon it he has no art to “ reckon his groans.” And we find that Ophelia has betrayed Hamlet, given his letter to her father—that is, to the Inquisition. Take the following passage, and we find how Ophelia is beautified by the art of Polonius—that is, by his infallibility :—

“ Ham. I have heard of your paintings too, well enough. God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another ; you jig, you amble, and you lisp, and nick-name God's creatures, and make your wantonness your ignorance : Go to, I'll no more on't ; it hath made me mad. I say, we will have no more marriages : those that are married already, all but one, shall live ; the rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go. [Exit Hamlet.] ”

And what can be more significant than the lines Hamlet addresses Ophelia :—

“ Doubt thou the stars are fire,
Doubt that the sun doth move,
Doubt truth to be a liar,
But never doubt, I love.”

It was Galileo and Bruno who were teaching these very doctrines which Hamlet tells Ophelia to doubt. "Doubt that the sun doth move"! Why, recall the well-known story of Galileo's pitiful recantation, or the persecution of Bruno and his burning in 1600 for asserting that the stars were worlds! But Hamlet's signature as Ophelia's is conditional only whilst the rack enforces his obedience and love:—

"Thine evermore, most dear lady, *whilst
this machine is to him, HAMLET.*"

Whilst the machine (or windlace) "is to him," or applied to him with violence, no doubt he will, like Galileo, recant or pretend love.

But we by no means say that Ophelia represents the Roman Catholic Church. She is religion in its highest sense, the spiritual aspirations of Man as the Soul, Love, (or affection)—all that is most beautiful in the mind, all that we aspire to through immortality. It is her relation to her father that makes her the helpless abject cypher she really is. We can see in the way the poet has portrayed her, the entire Passive Obedience of the Church. Study her character of submissiveness and entire obedience, her surrender of Hamlet's letter to her father, her real madness compared with Hamlet's feigned or apparent madness, and one can see that in her we have a character entirely dependent upon her Father's Authority and Infallibility. With his death she becomes incoherent, meaningless, foolish, and that this is the history of the Church there is much about its modern history to confirm. Nothing is more striking than the aberration of Ophelia's reason, her annihilation we may say, with her Father's Death. Without Polonius, without that "certainty" which would find truth within the centre,—without, in short, doctrinal infallibility or authority, what is the Church? Madness is simply incoherency; it is a state which the Church has for a long time presented to many; and we fear not only the Church, but something more precious than a Church, the faith which constitutes all religion has become, like Ophelia, in many cases incoherent—a quiet, beautiful, dying Church, beautifying the stream of time and change with the withered flowers of memory.

“ Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN. ”

Pol. You go to seek my lord Hamlet ; there he is.

Ros. God save you, sir !

[To Polonius.
[Exit Polonius.

Guil. Mine honour'd lord !—

Ros. My most dear lord !

Ham. My excellent good friends ! How dost thou, Guildenstern ? Ah, Rosencrantz ! Good lads, how do ye both ?

Ros. As the indifferent children of the earth.

Guil. Happy, in that we are not overhappy ; On fortune's cap we are not the very button.

Ham. Nor the soles of her shoe ?

Ros. Neither, my lord.

Ham. Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favour ?

Guil. 'Faith her privates we.

Ham. In the secret parts of fortune ? O, most true ; she is a strumpet. What's the news ?

Ros. None, my lord ; but that the world's grown honest.

Ham. Then is dooms-day near : But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular : What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of fortune, that she sends you to prison hither ?

Guil. Prison, my lord ?

Ham. Denmark's a prison.

Ros. Then is the world one.

Ham. A goodly one ; in which there are many confines, wards, and dungeons ; Denmark being one of the worst.

Ros. We think not so, my lord.

Ham. Why, then 't is none to you : for there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so : to me it is a prison.”

What a complete revelation we have of the characters of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern in this passage ! They live in the secret parts of Fortune, who Hamlet declares is a Strumpet, that is, who prostitutes and sells all that is sacred or true, even honour, for gain—advancement. Elsewhere we have a notable character of one of the plays, Doll Tearsheet, termed some “common road.” Rosencrantz and Guildenstern live in the very centre of Fortune's Favours, which are bought and sold to the highest bidder. And therefore they are indifferent to Hamlet's ways of thinking, for he lacks advancement. We see this brought out in the most striking way in the above passage. He finds the world a prison which he identifies with Denmark. But they find the world honest! And to his assertion that Denmark is one of the worst of prisons, they reply:—

“ We think not so, my lord.”

Their way of thinking is not Hamlet's.

But there can be no mistake as to the characters of Guildenstern and Rosencrantz; their names betray the favoured, unscrupulous throng, who prostitute themselves for power, pleasure, gain, and who are the “mighty opposites” and “adders fanged,” whose business is to entrap, entangle, and sophisticate with Truth, professing it with lip-service, its spies and traitors withal,—the great vested interests of the world, the courtiers of profit and power, who find the world no prison, but a very good place indeed for their traffic. In Rosencrantz we find a name suggestive of the garlands or wreaths (roses!) of folly and pleasure. In Guildenstern, (a name of Teutonic origin,) the idea of guilders, money, gold, (star of wealth,) is suggested. Whether these are fanciful derivations or no, their characters speak loudly enough for them. They go about to recover the wind of Hamlet, to steal his mystery, his truth from him, in order to play upon him, in order finally to betray him to the King, and pluck out the heart of his mystery. They are those who sell what is most dear—honour—for gain. They are the privates of that Strumpet Fortune, who sells Virtue for gold. Therefore their “thinking” is not Hamlet's “thinking.” They are sponges. They soak up the King's countenance, his rewards, his authorities. And their defeat does by their own insinuation grow. They are the baser natures which come between Hamlet and his work of revenge.

“ Hor. So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to 't.

Ham. Why, man, they did make love to this employment ;

They are not near my conscience ; their defeat
 Does by their own insinuation grow :
 'T is dangerous, when the baser nature comes
 Between the pass and fell incensed points
 Of mighty opposites."

There can be no possibility of escaping or mistaking the poet's intention in these characters. For we recognise them everywhere in life.

" Ham. Do not believe it.

Ros. Believe what ?

Ham. That I can keep your counsel, and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded of a sponge !—what replication should be made by the son of a king ?

Ros. Take you me for a sponge, my lord ?

Ham. Ay, sir ; that soaks up the king's countenance, his rewards, his authorities. But such officers do the king best service in the end : He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw ; first mouthed, to be last swallowed : When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again."

We find in Bacon's time a great deal of the squeezing operation going on. Favourites elevated to be disgraced,—an everlasting process of advancement, promotion, and very much squeezing. Hamlet is most dreadfully attended with such utterly indifferent and really antagonistic courtiers whom, it may be seen, whilst having no way of thinking like him, pretend to flatter him, in order to stifle or betray him. For this is the character of a great part of human nature, that where gain, power, or pleasure is concerned, the love of Truth for Truth's sake is a pretended courtship, that is in reality veiled hostility. For to such people the continuance of abuses and evil is a source of revenue and advancement. The history of the play is a history of society. The ridding of them by Hamlet is a gradual reforming process. A process which Dickens immortalised in many of his works. Upon a subject like this, which is so universal, so written large in human nature and in all history, it is easy to be impertinent or foolish.

Pol. Hath there been such a time (I'd fain know that,
That I have positively said 'T is so,
When it prov'd otherwise ?

King. Not that I know.

Pol. Take this from this, if this be otherwise :

[Pointing to his head and shoulder.
If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the centre."

There seems to us in these words of Polonius, the very essence of his character, which is belief in his own infallibility upon all things. He will find truth out "though it were hid indeed within the centre!" Nay, his very life and breath depends upon this infallibility of dogma and authority. But here let it be noted that he is not honest, as we have had already sufficient proofs. We see that Hamlet throws doubts upon his honesty in the scene where he tells Polonius he "would he were as honest a man as a fishmonger." Every reply of Hamlet's is a hit at Polonius. When Hamlet is asked what he is reading, he replies, "words, words, words;" and when further cross-examined as to the subject-matter of the words, he immediately identifies the "words, words, words," by presenting Polonius with his own satirical portrait, as an indirect way of telling us he is studying Polonius, and finds him only "words"! Then note that Polonius asks Hamlet to "walk out of the air," and Hamlet replies, "into my grave?" which is, we think, one of the most unmistakable hints of the play. Mark the clever and cunning of Hamlet's hits at Polonius, which are all side, or indirect hits, for "he cannot walk out of the air." There is, indeed, a species of challenge in the words of Polonius asking Hamlet to leave dreaming, to give o'er his theories, to step out of his philosophic cell and retreat!

Ham. Well, god-'a-mercy.

Pol. Do you know me, my lord?

Ham. Excellent well; you are a fishmonger.

Pol. Not I, my lord.

Ham. Then I would you were so honest a man.

Pol. Honest, my lord ?

Ham. Ay, sir ; to be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

Pol. That 's very true, my lord.

Ham. For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a god kissing carrion,—Have you a daughter ?

Pol. I have, my lord.

Ham. Let her not walk i' the sun : conception is a blessing ; but not as your daughter may conceive,—friend, look to 't.

Pol. How say you by that ? [Aside. Still harping on my daughter : —yet he knew me not at first ; he said I was a fishmonger : He is far gone, far gone : and truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love ; very near this. I'll speak to him again.] What do you read, my lord ?

Ham. Words, words, words !

Pol. What is the matter, my lord ?

Ham. Between who ?

Pol. I mean the matter that you read, my lord.

Ham. Slanders, sir : for the satirical slave says here, that old men have grey beards ; that their faces are wrinkled ; their eyes purging thick amber, or plum-tree gum ; and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with weak hams : All of which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty to have it thus set down ; for you yourself, sir, should be old as I am, if, like a crab, you could go backward.

Pol. Though this be madness, yet there is method in it. [Aside.] Will you walk out of the air, my lord ?

Ham. Into my grave ?

Pol. Indeed, that is out o' the air.—How pregnant sometimes his replies are ! a happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of."

“ And it may be you shall do posterity good, if, out of the carcase of dead and rotten greatness (as out of Samson's lion), there may be honey gathered for the use of future times.” (Bacon.)

What is carrion ? It is corruption—a corrupted and decayed Church needs light let in upon it to give it new life, and this is what Luther effected at the Reformation, but not to the liking of Authority, Dogma, and Infallibility like old Polonius. Hamlet tells Polonius that he dare not let his daughter “ walk i' the sun.” But this is exactly what the entire Reformation effected, viz.,

threw the pure light of reason and truth upon the decayed carcass of a rotten and thoroughly corrupt Church. Luther, whom we take as the protagonist of the Reformation (for the sake of example only), scrutinised the Church with that searching inward criticism, which we have already found Hamlet bestowing upon Ophelia. The result of that look was to doubt the honesty of the Papal Infallibility, Authority, and Dogma, already in its dotage. And we find Hamlet doubting the honesty of Polonius. He compares him to a fishmonger—one who barter souls (soles ?) for money, which immediately recalls to us the shameful sale of indulgences. Nor is Polonius even as honest as a fishmonger. But what is it Hamlet tells Polonius ? He dares and challenges him to let his daughter walk in the sun. How are we to interpret this ? The Reformation may truly be compared to a birth of new light. It was the offspring of the Renaissance, a word which sufficiently explains itself. Nothing is more true than the fact that this movement was one of light—light producing out of the Womb of the Dark Ages a new birth or rebirth, to which we owe modern progress. And so with the Church, which truly conceived in the sense Hamlet hints at, and brought forth the child of criticism, inquiry, learning—in short, all we term Light. But this very Light was the enemy of the old Infallible Church. No wonder Hamlet exclaims :—

“ Let her not walk i' the sun : conception is a blessing ; but not as your daughter may conceive,—friend, look to 't.”

To sum up the play of Hamlet, we should describe it as a gigantic philosophical tragedy of man's relationship to man, historically prefigured with an undercurrent of action bespeaking progress. The King seems an abstraction of enthroned Wrong or Evil, who can only be gradually killed through his representatives. We find the King saying :—

“ O my dear Gertrude, this,
Like to a murdering-piece, in many places
Gives me superfluous death.”

It seems to us that the keynote of the play is given in Hamlet's words :—

“The time is out of joint: O cursed spite,
That ever I was born to set it right!”

We have here an exclamation that applies universally and not particularly. Hamlet is a personified abstract of the very opposites of the King. As the philosophic genius of mankind warring against all the powers that be in possession, Hamlet is no individual, but a philosophic personification of the spiritual in man, fighting for the right, for truth's sake, dying at the stake, tortured on the rack, epitomised in the lives of such men as Luther, Bruno, Galileo, Campanella, Telesius, and all those who, like Hamlet, have assisted to free man from the trammels of State, Church, and King. That the play scene is an epitome of the Reformation we believe by the reference to Wittenberg. It is plain this place is dragged in as a hint. For from the moment Luther burnt the papal bull at that town, the Reformation had begun, and we see in like manner in the play that the death of Polonius soon follows the interlude. The Reformation was a complete and final blow at the infallibility of a dotard Church, and from that blow it never recovered.

CHAPTER XII.

SONNETS.

“ In the midst
Thou stand'st as though A MYSTERY thou didst.”
—(Addressed to Bacon. “Underwood's” Ben Jonson.)

THAT the genius and mind of the author of the plays was completely beyond the comprehension of his age or times is proved by his own words:—

“ So I, made lame by fortune's dearest spite.”

Again repeated in Chester's “Love's Martyr” :—

“ My undeserved wit, wit sprung too soon,
To give thy greatnesse every gracious right.”

Bacon writes the same thing to his son (the Masculine Birth of Time) in these words:—

“ ‘And what,’ you will say, ‘is this legitimate method? Have done with artifice and circumlocution; show me the NAKED TRUTH of your design, that I may be able to form a judgment for myself.’ I would, my dearest son, that matters were in such a state with you as to render this possible. Do you suppose that, when all the entrances and passages to the mind of all men are infested and obstructed with the darkest idols, and these seated and burned in, as it were, into their substance, that clear and smooth places can be found for receiving the true and natural rays of objects? A new process must be instituted by which to insinuate ourselves into minds so entirely obstructed. For, as the delusions of the insane are removed by ART and ingenuity, but aggravated by opposition, so must we adapt ourselves to the universal insanity.”

This is a confession that Bacon considered "naked truth" an impossibility in his age. And, therefore, he says, "a new process" or "artifice" must be adopted to "adapt ourselves to the universal insanity." Now, here (by the way only) is proof that Bacon concealed his opinions by some process connected with art! And we should like to know what that "process" was?

But the greatest proof of all is that Bacon appeals to posterity, to after ages, to appreciate and comprehend him, so that we find his entire genius is in league with time; and this same point we find endlessly repeated in the Sonnets:—

"And, all in war with Time, for love of you,
As he takes from you, I engraft you new."

"But wherefore do not you a mightier way,
Make war upon this bloody tyrant, Time?"

"And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defence, Save breed, to brave him when he takes thee hence."

"O fearful meditation! where, alack,
Shall Time's best jewel from Time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?"

"Yet, do thy worst, old Time; despite thy wrong,
My love shall in my verse ever live young."

How is it we find the two foremost minds of the same age both bent upon cheating time, both addressing far-off ages?

Here is one of Bacon's titles:—"To the present age and posterity, greeting." ("Topics of Life and Death.")

How is it we find Bacon (who had no child) addressing himself to a son (in the Masculine Birth of Time), and Shakespeare in his Sonnets proposing the begetting of a son also, who is connected with some extraordinary rebirth associated with time?—

"So thou, thyself outgoing in thy noon, Unlook'd on diest, unless thou get a son."

"But were some child of yours alive that time,
You should live twice;—in it, and in my rhyme."

"O! none but unthrifths:—Dear my love, you know
You had a father; let your son say so." —Sonnets.

And mark it, Time is to surrender this son—this Masculine Birth of Time :—

“O thou, my lovely boy, who in thy power
Dost hold Time's fickle glass, his sickle, hour ;
Who has by waning grown, and therein show'st
Thy lovers withering, as thy sweet self grow'st ;
If Nature, sovereign mistress over wrack
As thou goest onwards, still will pluck thee back,
She keeps thee to this purpose, that her skill
May time disgrace, and wretched minutes kill.
Yet fear her, O thou minion of her pleasure !
She may detain, but not still keep, her treasure :
Her audit, though delay'd, answer'd must be,
And her quietus is to render thee.”

“Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity
Shall you pace forth ; your praise shall still find room,
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.
So till the judgment that yourself arise,
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.”

—Sonnets.

The entire theme of the Sonnets is marriage for the sake of getting this son, who is to be reborn through time. Cannot the reader see that this is the Logos doctrine ?—

“Make thee another self, for love of me,
That beauty still may live in thine or thee.”

“But the Father of all things, The Mind, being Life and Light, begat (engendered) a Man like to Himself, whom He loved as His own child, for He was very beautiful, having the image of His Father. For, in fact, moreover The God loved His own form, and to this delivered over all His own creations.” (Poemandres I., “Hermes Trismegistus.”)

As we cannot quote the entire work, we refer the reader to Chambers's translation of “Hermes Trismegistus,” where he will find abundance of evidence. Also to Philo, Plato, and St John for this Logos doctrine.

If, then, Bacon's knowledge was too dangerous to publish during his age, what other "artifice" or resource had he? We reply Art. That art, however, if addressed to posterity, must be provided with a key for its unlocking. Here, in our opinion, his superhuman genius steps in to assist him. He will imitate Nature, and provide a key in his own works. And he will heighten the effect of his art by adding the same mystery, the same secrecy and reserve as Nature. He will be secretly open. He will hide himself behind his works, as the Divine Mind (son or Logos) in those works. He will provide a series of Sonnets profoundly veiled, as creative principles, in which this scheme is set forth at length. And he will allow another man to carry the title of author until he is revealed.

Now a second reason for concealment is, that having allowed his early works to go to the theatre anonymously, and thus to get associated with Shakespeare's name, he was forced to continue to do so, or else confess to the entire fraud. This, in his position of statesman and grave lawyer, would have added little to his reputation with Queen Elizabeth or King James, in an age when the playwright's art was looked down upon as a despised thing. Had he confessed to his authorship, his plays would have been ransacked by his enemies into charges against him of treason (as in the case of Richard II.) or of frivolous writing. In Bacon's age no statesman, or law officer of the crown, could have sustained his dignity, or his career of ambition, with an acknowledged reputation as poet or playwright.

We see that what he really valued in his plays and poems was just what he could not divulge to his age, and that therefore he was forced to address himself to another age for appreciation. This is proved by the following Sonnet,—in which he says his "tongue-tied muse" is silent, whilst he receives all sorts of letters of praise for his "dumb thoughts speaking in effect"—in action:—

"My tongue-tied muse in manners holds her still,
While comments of your praise, richly compil'd,

Reserve their character with golden quill,
 And precious phrase by all the muses fill'd.
 I think good thoughts, while others write good words,
 And, like unletter'd clerk, still cry Amen
 To every hymn that able spirit affords,
 In polish'd form of well-refined pen.
 Hearing you prais'd, I say 't is so, 't is true,
 And to the most of praise add something more ;
 But that is in my thought, whose love to you,
 Though words come hindmost, holds his rank before.
 Then others for the breath of words respect,
 Me for my dumb thoughts, speaking in effect."

Nothing can be plainer than the above Sonnet. He is praised extravagantly for his plays by his friends, but only for the outward or external—for the "breath of words," not for the "spirit of the letter" (for it is the letter that killeth). Therefore he must address himself to posterity, in this fashion :—

"To give away yourself, keeps yourself still ;
 And you must live, drawn by your own sweet skill."

If he was to "give away himself," nobody would believe him or understand him, and it would be a barren task—only resulting in keeping himself.

"Who will believe my verse in time to come,
 If it were filled with your most high deserts ?
 Though yet heaven knows, it is but as a tomb
 Which hides your life, and shows not half your parts.
 If I could write the beauty of your eyes,
 And in fresh numbers number all your graces,
 The age to come would say, this poet lies,
 Such heavenly touches ne'er touch'd earthly faces."

Therefore, this scheme of rejuvenescence by which he will appear to after ages as to himself—

|--|---|---|
| Self (or Alter Ego), as Creative Mind, Logos or Son. | { | "But here's the joy—my friend and I are one ; Sweet flattery ! then she loves but me alone." "Tis thee (myself) that for myself I praise, Painting my age with beauty of thy days." "What can my own praise to mine own self bring ? And what is't but mine own, when I praise thee ?" "Then do thy office, Muse ; I teach thee how To make him seem long hence as he shows now." |
|--|---|---|

Therefore, as he cannot realize his full glory except in dreams (and this touches the point of authorship), he writes :—

“ Thus have I had thee, as a dream doth flatter,
In sleep a king, but waking, no such matter.”

“ Farewell ! thou art too dear for my possessing,
* * * * *

Wander a word for shadows like myself,
That take the pain, but cannot pluck the pelf.”

What more does the world want than these words of his own ! Does he not tell us that he is tired of life in an age where he cannot be understood ?—

“ And art made tongue-tied by authority.
* * * * *

Are we not told that we are to take a new acquaintance with his mind ?—

“ The wrinkles which thy glass will truly show,
Of mouthed graves will give thee memory ;
Thou by thy dial's shady stealth may'st know
Time's thievish progress to eternity.
Look, what thy memory cannot contain,
Commit to these waste blanks, and thou shalt find
Those children nurs'd, deliver'd from thy brain,
To take a new acquaintance of thy mind.
These offices, so oft as thou wilt look,
Shall profit thee, and much enrich thy book.”

We utterly despair of rousing the world to the fact that all this is addressed to us and not to any contemporary. How curious it is that these poems are read and reread by thousands, and all are blind as moles to the fact that the whole of the poet's art is unlocked in them. So true is it that—

“ The jewel that we find, we stop and take it,
Because we see it ; but what we do not see,
We tread upon, and never think of it.”

Or as the same author writes in prose :—

“ It is evident, that the dullness of men is such and so infelicitous, that when things are put before their feet, they do not see them, unless admonished, but pass right on." No doubt "everything is subtle till it be conceived," writes the same author. "What is strange, is the result of ignorance in the case of all," says Plato.

After accepting the plays and poems and all that has been written upon them as final and exhaustive, the world will all at once catch the true right light for the perspective of this art picture, and see what is written behind it, and then we shall have everybody rushing off to explain it. We would give a great deal to be able to be as clear to the reader, as what we are endeavouring to explain is clear to ourselves. Unhappily it is a difficult subject, though only apparently so. First it requires faith to open the understanding and keep it sustained to the point of interest (which only faith can give), faith being born of clear sight. Secondly, such a miracle and seeming impossibility is suggested in this theory of rebirth that it is difficult to obtain a moment's serious thought concerning it. Thirdly, that directly one brings in the word Logos, or talks of creative principles, the reader has a headache, or has to attend to the papering of the back attic. And we understand all this perfectly, having found out that words bark oftener than they bite, and that behind the everlasting jugglery and legerdmain of philology lays all the metaphysical impostures of thought over which centuries of sects and writers have fought and quarrelled often to the death. Nobody knew this better than Bacon, and our belief is that not only his entire Inductive Philosophy, but this art of his called Shakespeare's, was constructed once and for ever to show up by a pattern or exemplar, the fantastic tricks of theological, metaphysical, and philological mysteries, which have from words produced idols of Superstition which have enslaved and governed us as the Frankensteins of our own creation. We are determined not to fill this work with endless quotations from Plato, Philo, St John, or any other exponent of the Logos doctrine, to exemplify our meaning. And we are sure the critic will thank us. If he does not understand what we mean, let him lay down this book, because a few quotations would not assist him, and would very much enlarge our volume to no effect. But we mean to illustrate the Logos doctrine in a very few words by the tritest possible image. It means Thought (Ideas) or Mind. It is employed to signify the Creative intellect hidden behind the works of Nature. And at bottom it is just what the meaning of a myth, fable, or allegory is in relation to its vehicle—or external art side. This is certainly an easy way of dismissing it, but what is it we always find constant at the bottom of this Logos doctrine? We find that the Son is always the Heir, and at the same time the Truth, and Mind (Thought, or Wisdom), Life, Light through which everything was created. This is perfectly logical. Because a man's thought is well pictured by the relationship of Son, inasmuch as it comes forth of him, and is and is not him, at the same time. Then to become visible it must be united to words (art), or some material (vehicle) which resembles marriage. Whence from this marriage arises again the idea of the Son begetting, because the Logos (meaning) is hidden and concealed or begot in the vehicle. Its reappearance is highly suggestive of a rebirth—since it comes to light again as the Father's Creative Thought. Thus in the marrying of an idea to art, there are always three factors, the Thinker (or Father creator)—the Thought (or Son)—the vehicle (or Woman). The Thought becomes sacrificed (incarnation), concealed,—and when it is reborn it reveals the father's thought. It is around these relationships or metaphysical conceits that the entire Trinity Doctrine revolves! The student is bound to bear in mind, that the union of Idea (or Thought) to Matter, is of the nature of marriage, since two things become identified as “a union in partition.” Also that all the ancient writers describe this as male on one side, female on the other, and that the two constitute when united an androgynous being which we re-find in the Sonnets under the title of Master-Mistress.

Cory writes:—“By comparing all the varied legends of the west and east in conjunction, we may obtain the following outline of the theology of the ancients. It recognises, as the primary elements of all things, two independent principles, of the nature of male and female. And these in mystic union, as soul and body, constitute the great Hermaphroditic deity, the One, the universe itself, consisting of two elements of its composition, modified though combined in one individual, of which all things were considered but as parts." (Introductory Dissertation to Cory's "Ancient Fragments," p. xxxiv.)

It will be seen in this "Hermaphroditic deity" we have the Master-Mistress of the poet's Sonnets—viz., the union of the male and the female, of the friend and the mistress.

"Timæus Locrus says of the causes of all things:—'Idea or Form is of the nature of Male and Father; but Matter of the nature of Female and Mother.'" (Cory's "Fragments," 302.)

Again:—"Matter is the receptacle of Form, the mother and female principle of the generation of the third essence; for, by receiving the likeness upon itself, and being stamped with Form, it perfects all things, partaking of the nature of generation." (Ibid.)

"The world appears to them (the Egyptians) to consist of a masculine and feminine nature. And they engrave a scarabæus for Athena, and a vulture for Hephæstus. For these alone of all the Gods they consider as both male and female in their nature." (Horapollo.)

"Plutarch, describing the mysteries, says:—'God is a male and female intelligence, being both life and light he brought forth another intelligence, the creator of the world'; Orpheus (who is supposed to have introduced the mysteries into Greece) sings:—'Jove is a male, Jove is an unspotted virgin.' The Brahminical doctrine in the Sama Veda says:—'the will to create existed with the Deity as his bride.' The Verihad, Aranyaka, and Upanishad teaches the same:—'he caused himself to fall in two and thus became husband and wife.' ('Yarker's Mysteries of Antiquities.')

A study of the ancient doctrines of creation, will always discover this symbolism of marriage as expressive of the creative art. For example, in every triad there is a male, a female, and an androgyne. An acute student of the Sonnets will find these treated separately, yet commixedly, as a paradox of contradictions. 'Eminent scholars, who have devoted themselves to the investigation of the ancient cults, have shown to demonstration that the most primitive idea of God was that he consisted of a dual nature, masculine and feminine joined in one, and this androgynous deity gave birth to creation.' ('Great Dionysiak Myth.,' Brown, vol. ii., p. 302.)

Heraclitus' conception of the Logos is that it is "the rational law apparent in this world."

Why do we introduce all this? Because the entire opening theme of the Sonnets is Marriage for the sake of rebirth or immortal offspring! But this is the actual simile by which Socrates in the Banquet illustrates Creation Divine or poetic. And there cannot be a moment's doubt that the Friend of the Sonnets is not Lord Southampton, or any real person at all, but the poet's alter ego, or Mind, which as creative Logos, is to be obscured by marriage with art, and be by rebirth his son and heir, as the spiritual in this art revealed, or again come to light—through time. This is no ingenious theory in the mazes of which we have lost ourselves, but the result of a dozen years' study, and we could fill volumes to prove it, not here and there, but everywhere in these marvellous Sonnets. Every paradox melts before it, but its genius is that of Hermetic mystery, because it is a metaphysical subject highly obscured to avoid premature discovery. We are told how careful he was when he took his way to hide each trifle that might reveal him too soon:—

"How careful was I when I took my way,
Each trifle under truest bars to thrust,
That to my use it might unused stay
From hands of falsehood, in sure wards of trust!"

What, then, is our theory? It is that this art is completely Double. Not what may be termed allegorical, but like Nature, and it embraces another side, which is as philosophic as the "Novum Organum." Many have surmised this before us. Carlyle wrote (from Donnelly's "Great Cryptogram") :—"There is an understanding manifested in the construction of Shakespeare's plays equal to that in Bacon's 'Novum Organum.'"

Hazlit makes the same remark :—"The wisdom displayed in Shakespeare was equal in profoundness to the great Lord Bacon's 'Novum Organum.'"

"Novalis, one of the subtlest of German thinkers, remarks with regard to our poet's Art :—

" 'The latest sharp-minded observer will find new coincidences, with endless system of the universe, collisions with later ideas, relationships with the higher powers and senses of humanity. They are symbolical, full of interpretation, simple and inexhaustible, like the creations of nature, and nothing more unfit can be said of them, than that they are a work of art in the narrow mechanical meaning of the word.'—(Werke.) Novalis only enunciates what Coleridge endeavoured to enforce, viz., the organic character of the poet's art. This is only a metaphor, for dual unity. An organism is the product of an internal, spiritual force, giving itself outward expression through nature or art. There must be soul or symbolism where there is organism."

But the world accepts the plays in the light of an unconscious genius embodying more rationalism than it can itself explain, as in the case of Faust and Goethe. But this is quite an error. This art, as he tells us, was planned far from accident, and is hugely politic, laying great bases for eternity! It was deliberately planned and constructed for a complete and perfect self-revelation through time. When did this idea first take its inception? Not from the beginning, because he tells us in the 20th Sonnet, that it was first intended to be single, but that, like Pygmalion, he fell in love with his own creation, and determined to give it life. And this idea we can see repeated in the statue of Hermione upon her pedestal, who represents his entire sleeping art, waiting the return of its life or spirit (Perdita) to reveal itself to us, not as now a speechless statue, but as a thing of rebirth and revelation—of soul and intellect, not as a mere picture, but as man-woman — that is, dual unity, separated and united as Hermione is from Leontes through time.

Marcus Antoninus says :—“ The nature of the universe delights not in anything so much as to alter all things and present them under another form. This is her conceit, to play one game and commence another. Nature is placed before her like a piece of wax, and she shapes it to all forms and figures. Now she makes a bird, then out of the bird a beast ; now a flower, then a frog.”

Compare—

“ Since I left you, mine eye is in my minde,
 And that which governes me to goe about,
 Doth part his function, and is partly blind,
 Seemes seeing, but effectually is out :
 For it no forme delivers to the heart
 Of birds, or flower, or shape which it doth lack,
 Of his quick objects hath the mind no part,
 Nor his owne vision holds what it doth catch :
 For if it see the rud'st or gentlest sight,
 The most sweet favour or deformedst creature,
 The mountaine, or the sea, the day, or night :
 The Crow, or Dove, it shapes them to your feature.
 Incapable of more repleat, with you,
 My most true minde thus maketh mine untrue.”

CHAPTER XIII.

BACONIANA.

“His Lordship was a good Poet,¹ but conceal'd, as appears by his ‘Letters.’”—Aubrey.

THE parallels between Bacon's writings and Shakespeare's are not only endless, but have been so fully treated by Mrs Henry Pott, and Mr Donnelly in his recent great work, that it seems superfluous to add anything further. It would be easy to fill another volume of fresh ones, and they will continue to be discovered the deeper both writers are studied. We therefore have endeavoured to avoid repetition, and have only added those which we think are striking as parallels, which we may call (like the following) double as to identical names, and threefold as to these names being found connected with the same strain or line of thought. In Hamlet (graveyard scene) we have the following:—

“Ham. To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander, till he find it stopping a bung-hole?

Hor. 'T were to consider too curiously, to consider so.

Ham. No, faith, not a jot; but to follow him thither with modesty enough, and likelihood to lead it. As thus; Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth into dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam : And why of that loam, whereto he was converted, might they not stop a beer-barrel ?

Imperial Cæsar, dead, and turn'd to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away :
O, that that earth, which kept the world in awe,
Should patch a wall to expel the winter's flaw !”

Note here that Alexander and Cæsar (Augustus Cæsar) are brought in both in sequence ; and now read this from (Century viii., 771) Bacon's "Natural History," where we find Augustus Cæsar (Imperial Cæsar) brought in with Alexander as they are in the passage from Hamlet. What are the odds against two different writers thus similarly connoting two Emperors (who lived at different ages), upon the same subject, in the same manner ? "But I find in Plutarch and others, that when Augustus Cæsar visited the Sepulchre of Alexander the Great in Alexandria he found the body to keep his dimension ; but withal that notwithstanding all the embalming (which no doubt was of the best), the body was so tender, as Cæsar touching but the nose of it defaced it."

But this is not the end of the parallel. The entire experiment, which is touching "the conservation of dead bodies," is just the same subject that Hamlet makes inquiry upon of the first Clown in the scene quoted.

"Ham. How long will a man lie i' the earth ere he rot ?"

This is the entire subject-matter of inquiry that Bacon makes in this same experiment 771. "It is strange, and well to be noted, how long carcasses have continued uncorrupt, and in their former dimensions, as appeareth in the Mummies of Egypt, having lasted, as is conceived (some of them) three thousand years."

Then Bacon discusses the three causes of putrefaction. The remedies are first to exclude the air. Lastly, he says :—"There is a fourth Remedy also, which is, that if the body to be preserv'd be of bulk, as a Corps is, then the body that incloseth it must have a virtue to draw forth and dry the moisture of the inward body; for else the putrefaction will play within, though nothing issue forth."

Now these two last lines form the pith of the Clown's reply to Hamlet's question, as to "How long will a man lie i' the earth ere he rot?"

"1 Clo. 'Faith, if he be not rotten before he die (as we have many pocky coarses now-a-days, that will scarce hold the laying in), he will last you some eight year, or nine year: a tanner will last you nine year.

Ham. Why he more than another?"

1 Clo. Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade, that he will keep out water a great while; and your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. Here's a scull now: this scull has lain in the earth three-and-twenty years."

The Clown gives the same reply or explanation as Bacon, i.e., that "moisture," or, in other words, water "is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body." Now do we not see from the very commencement of the scene to the end the same inquiry, the same reply, and Alexander and Cæsar brought in at the close of both quotations? It is a miracle if two different men wrote these two passages!

But this is such a curious subject that we must continue it. Bacon writes (from the same experiment, 771):—"I remember Livy doth relate, that there were found at a time, two coffins of lead in a tomb, whereof the one contained the body of King Numa, it being some four hundred years after his death; and the other his Books of Sacred Rites and Ceremonies, and the Discipline of the Pontiffs. And that in the Coffin that had the body, there was nothing at all to be seen but a little light Cinders about the sides; but in the Coffin that had the Books, they were found as fresh as if they had been but newly written, being written in Parchment, and covered over with Watch-candles of Wax three or four-fold." What a close study Bacon seems to have given this subject, what a subtle, searching, profound Mind is this, and we do not know that he had not perhaps a purport in making a study of this solemn subject! In all this there is a strange resemblance to the history of Christian Rosy-cross and his grave, which we now give from the "Fama Fraternalitatis":—

"The vault was a heptagon. Every side was five feet broad and eight feet high. It was illuminated by an artificial sun. In the centre was placed instead of a grave-stone a circular altar with a little plate of brass, whereon these words were inscribed: This grave, an abstract of the whole world, I made for myself whilst yet living (A. C. R. C. Hoc Universi compendium vivus mihi sepulchrum feci). About the margin was—To me Jesus is all in all (Jesus mihi omnia). In the centre were four figures enclosed in a circle by this revolving legend: Nequaquam vacuum legis jugum. Libertas Evangelii. Dei gloria intacta. (The empty yoke of the law is made void. The liberty of the gospel. The unsullied glory of God.) Each of the seven sides of the vault had a door opening into a chest; which chest, besides the secret books of the order and the Vocabularium of Paracelsus, contained also mirrors—little bells—burning lamps—marvellous mechanisms of music, &c., all so contrived that after the lapse of many centuries, if the whole order should have perished, it might be re-established by means of this vault. Under the altar, upon raising the brazen tablet, the brothers found the body of Rosycross, without taint or corruption. The right hand held a book written upon vellum with golden letters: this book, which is called T., has since become the most precious jewel of the society next after the Bible."

We see that the body of Christian Rosycross was preserved "without taint or corruption"—a subject we have found Bacon writing upon. And we find books buried with him, after the same fashion described by Bacon of Numa.

It seems to us as if we could almost trace the hand of Bacon even to the curse upon Shakespeare's supposed tombstone at Stratford:—

"Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here:
Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones."

“Mr F. C. Heaven, alluding to the same epitaph, writes : ‘I was struck with the resemblance of two lines in the quotation from Bacon’s “Retired Courtier” to those on Shakspeare’s tomb at Stratford. Bacon’s lines in his “Retired Courtier” to which I refer are :—

‘Blest be the hearts that wish my Sovereign well !
Curst be the soul that thinks her any wrong !’

While those on Shakspeare’s tomb read :—

‘Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.’

Does not this similarity point to Bacon as the author of the quaint lines in Stratford Church generally attributed to Shakspeare himself ?”

There is certainly a certain resemblance in the style, because we see that in both Bacon’s lines, and Shakespeare’s epitaph, the words “Blest” and “Curst,” begin and follow in the same order, opening each sentence of the two lines in a striking way. Both possess the identical “Blest be the,” and both the same “Curst be.” Both again repeat and bring in the word “that” at the same turn in the sentence, and for the same reason. At anyrate there are deep grounds for supposing Bacon to have been a Rosicrucian, and the monument of Shakspeare at Stratford is decidedly Rosicrucian. The two famous pillars flank the bust, and above are the two Cupids of life and death, which are well-known Rosicrucian emblems, as inverse factors. The two Cupids are seated upon the top of the monument. One holds an inverted torch, and with closed eyes, rests his hand upon a skull. This is the genius of Death, who with inverted brand typifies the “put out” or quenched brand (or flame) of existence. But he is a Cupid nevertheless, as is also his facsimile, who sits on the other side, with eyes open staring plainly, with his right hand resting upon a spade ! The spade is a Rosicrucian emblem of the phallus. It is the instrument of sowing, or placing seed in mother-earth, with the result of new-life, rebirth ! Cupid (as Love) is a seed bearer, for he causes new life to spring out of Death. It is for this reason that he reclaims from Death—gives immortality—the immortality of Nature and of the soul. His spade is the emblem of the seed sower, and the seed is the source of the new life. We find Shakespeare alluding to the spade, as arms, very profoundly in Hamlet. The original of Spade is Spada,¹ a sword, whence we see the source of its name lies closely connected with arms. The sword and sheath, even to the name of the latter (Vagina), have stood for emblems which the reader will readily guess. The spade has no sheath, except it be buried in the earth, when it becomes the means of fertilization.

“Come, my spade. There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers: they hold up Adam’s profession.

Sec. Clo. Was he a gentleman?

First Clo. A’ was the first that ever bore arms.

Sec. Clo. Why, he had none.

First Clo. What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture. The Scripture says ‘Adam digged:’ could he dig without arms?”

Which recalls—

“When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?”

There can be no question upon the Rosicrucian character and symbolism of these two Cupids upon the Stratford monument. Love and Death as antitheta, yet holding out to each other promise of rebirth and immortality, are emblems belonging to the Rosicrucians, who give a motto to one of Lord Lytton's chapters in "Zanoni."

"From the Sarcophagus and the urn I awake the Genius of the extinguished Torch, and so closely does its shape resemble Eros, that at moments I scarcely know which of ye dictate to me, O Love! O Death!" ("Zanoni.")

With regard to Bacon's skull, Dr Ingleby writes ("Shakespeare's Bones," p. 27):—

"Before addressing myself to the principal matter of this essay, namely the question whether we should not attempt to recover Shakespeare's skull, I may as well note that the remains of the great philosopher, whom so many regard as Shakespeare's very self, or else his alter ego, were not allowed to remain unmolested in their grave in St Michael's Church, St Albans. Thomas Fuller, in his Worthies, relates as follows: 'Since I have read that his grave being occasionally opened [!] his skull (the relique of civil veneration) was by one King, a Doctor of Physick, made the object of scorn and contempt; but he who then derided the dead has since become the laughingstock of the living.' This, being quoted by a correspondent in Notes and Queries, elicited from Mr C. Le Poer Kennedy, of St Albans, an account of a search that had been made for Bacon's remains, on the occasion of the interment of the last Lord Verulam. 'A partition wall was pulled down, and the search extended into the part of the vault immediately under the monument, but no remains were found.' On the other hand, we have the record of his express wish to be buried there. I am afraid the doctor, who is said to have become the laughingstock of the living, has entirely faded out of men's minds and memories."

We have, however, heard this contradicted by the present Earl Verulam's lodge-keeper, Simpson, who assured us he had been in the vault below the chancel of St Michael's Church, and had seen Lord Bacon's coffin, and read the inscription. He related an account of the opening of the vault at the time of the restoration of St Michael's Church, when the brother of the late Charles Dickens and others descended and inspected the tomb. He declares he saw an inscription upon a coffin which identified the remains of Lord Bacon. But evidence of this sort must be taken with circumspection, nor does it for a moment prove that the coffin has not been desecrated. However, we are not inclined to attach any weight to Fuller's words.

We find John Warren, in some dedicatory lines to Shakespeare, writing thus (after Shakespeare's death). The original is in the British Museum. (Republished by A. R. Smith, 1885, 250 copies only.)

"OF MR WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

"What, lofty Shakespeare, art againe reviv'd?
And Virbius' like now show'st thyself twice liv'd,
'Tis love that thus to thee is showne,
The labours his, the glory still thine owne."

This comparison to Virbius is curious, and the last line seems to indicate that "the labours" were another's (his), though Shakespeare "still" owns the glory. The third line hints at some indulgence accorded to Shakespeare through "love":—

"Tis love that thus to thee is showne,
The labours his, the glory still thine owne."

Surely these strange lines hint that Shakespeare is deriving glory from another's labours, an indulgence that is granted through love? Or take this epigram, written by Ben Jonson (Number 51), and please note that this "poor poet ape" is evidently Shakespeare, inasmuch as he is called "our chief":—

"ON POET APE.

" 'Poor Poet Ape,'² that would be thought our chief,
Whose works are e'en the frippery of wit,

¹ Virbius, an ancient king of Aricia, and a favourite of Diana, who, when he had died, called him to life again, and entrusted him to the care of Egeria. The fact of his being a favourite of Diana's seems to have led the Romans to identify him with Hyppolytus.—"Classical Dict."

² Compare—

"The fox, the ape, and the humble-bee,
Were still at odds, being but three.

From brokage has become so bold a thief,
 That we, the robb'd, have rage and pity it.
 At first he made low shifts, would pick and glean,
 Buy the reversion of old plays."

This is evidently a dramatist who buys "the reversion of old plays," and though the "frippery of wit" can hardly be applied to the so-called Shakespearian plays, we are not certain Shakespeare did not write something to keep up his false character as playwright.

We all know that Shakespeare was termed the "Sweet swan of Avon." Compare the following deep reference by Bacon to swans as having imperishable immortality :—

"For Lives; I do find strange that these times have so little esteemed the virtues of the times, as that the writing of lives should be no more frequent. For although there be not many sovereign princes or absolute commanders, and that states are most collected into monarchies, yet there are many worthy personages that deserve better than dispersed report or barren elogies. For herein the invention of one of the late poets is proper, and doth well enrich the ancient fiction: for he feigneth that at the end of the thread or web of every man's life there was a little medal containing the person's name, and that Time waited upon the shears; and so soon as the thread was cut, caught the medals, and carried them to the river of Lethe; and about the bank there were many birds flying up and down, that would get the medals, and carry them in their beak a little while, and then let them fall into the river: only there were a few swans,

"Arm. Until the goose came out of door, Staying the odds by adding four."

"Cost. O marry me to one Frances:—I smell some l'envoy, some goose in this."—(Love's Labour's Lost, Act iii. sc. 2.)

Now in Love's Labour's Lost, there is no character or person of the name of Frances at all. Bacon's Christian name was Francis, and we have a shrewd suspicion that the humble-Bee (B) may probably be the humble Bacon, who surrendered the fruits of his modesty to the Poet Ape—his right of authorship.

which if they got a name, would carry it to a temple, where it was consecrated."

Does not Bacon seem to be thinking of the "Sweet Swan of Avon"? But, according to the clever critics, Bacon had never heard of Shakespeare or his works! Yet both are friends—intimate friends—with Lord Southampton. At any rate, it is curious Bacon avoids—so carefully avoids—alluding to Shakespeare. Why does he do so? Examine the above passage. We find at once that "about the bank (of Lethe) there were many birds" flying up and down, "that would get the medals," which suggest the picking up and seizing of another's fame, for each of these medals carried the "person's name," the true author's name, which they carried "in their beak a little while"! Then comes that curious conclusion (which immediately recalls, with its swanlike comparison, Shakespeare), "only there were a few swans, which if they got a name," would carry it to a temple, where it was consecrated"! In these words Bacon seems to be hinting at the difficulty of a right identification of authorship, of the real swan's poetic rights, carried by other birds for a little while, but finally, "if the name could be got at," rescued from the oblivion and consecrated in a temple. Temple House is the name to this day by which the old ruins of Bacon's house at Gorhambury are known. Shakespeare's arms contain a falcon.

The Induction.

(Taming of the Shrew.)

We have a striking hint given to us in the portrait of Christopher Sly, of somebody outside the plays, bearing dignities and honours that in no wise belong to him. It is worthy of particular attention that Sly is outside the play, and in nowise contributes to the unity thereof. This Induction has puzzled and must perplex every profound student of the plays. Because it is a violation of the unity of dramatic presentation, and if left out would in no way affect the Taming of the Shrew as a perfect play in itself. Nor can we believe the author of such art as this to have been ignorant of the incongruity and apparently purposeless addition of this induction. It seems to us rather that Sly is placed outside the play as a false Lord and master of the players who present it, and holds this false position just as long as the play and its outer action lasts. It has never been remarked how strange it seems that Sly disappears from the play altogether after the first scene. This is curious, because, as we shall presently show, in the original story from which the idea of the induction is borrowed, the joke played upon Sly's original is brought to a conclusion. There is something singularly striking in the way Sly is forgotten, yet left to the imagination always in the false position of playing Lord, and presiding over plays and players belonging to another; and mark it, a Lord. We intend to present some pregnant parallels which bring the identity of Shakespeare to Sly suspiciously together. For example, Shakespeare's wife's maiden name was Anne Hathaway, and we find Sly exclaiming, "by Saint Anne!"

- "1st Serv. My lord, you nod; you do not mind the play.
Sly. Yes, by Saint Anne do I. A good matter surely.
 Comes there any more of it?
Page. My lord, 't is but begun.
Sly. 'T is a very excellent piece of work, madam lady.
 'Would 't were done!"

After this droll and humorous interlude, or interruption, no more is heard of Sly, and he disappears from the play as if he had never been introduced at all. Now in the original story, from which the incident of the induction is borrowed, we are presented with the restoration of Sly to his former and real condition of common life, as forming no small part of the especial point and humour of the joke played him by the Duke Philip. I speak of The Waking Man's Dream. The dénouement of the trick played Sly concludes as follows:—

"Then the right Duke, who had put himself among the throng of his Officers to have the pleasure of this mummery, commanded that this sleeping man should be stript out of his brave cloathes, and cloathed againe in his old ragges, and so sleeping carried and layd in the same place where he was taken up the night before. This was presently done, and there did he snort all the night long, not taking any hurt either from the hardnesse of the stones or the night ayre, so well was his stomacke filled with good preservatives. Being awakened in the morning by some passenger, or it maye bee by some that the good Duke Philip had thereto appointed, ha! said he, my friends, what have you done? you have rob'd mee of a Kingdome, and have taken mee out of the sweetest and happiest dreame that ever man could have fallen into. Then, very well remembering all the particulars of what had passed the day before, he related unto them, from point to point, all that had happened unto him, still thinking it assuredly to bee a dreame. Being returned home to his house, hee entertaines his wife, neighbours, and friends, with this his dreame, as hee thought: the truth whereof being at last published by the mouthes of those Courtiers who had been present at this pleasant recreation, the good man could not beleeve it, thinking that for sport they had framed this history upon his dreame; but when Duke Philip, who would have the full contentment of this pleasant tricke, had shewed him the bed wherein he lay, the cloathes which he had worne, the persons who had served him, the Hall wherein he had eaten, the gardens and galleries wherein he had walked, hardly could hee be induced to beleeve what hee saw, imagining that all this was meere inchantment and illusion."

Now why, I ask, have we this amusing termination omitted? Why is Sly left in the play, as it were, still in his false position of Lord over the players?

Let us examine some other parallels. In the recent correspondence in the newspapers upon the authorship of the plays, much has been made of the reference made by Sly to Wincot or (Wilmecôte), a village in the neighbourhood of Stratford, to show that the author must have been Shakespeare, and acquainted well with Warwickshire. We think this allusion to Wincot proves conclusively that Sly is a portrait of Shakespeare, but it suggests powerfully that he did not write the plays, but was set up in Bacon's place by Bacon, in just such a way as Sly is set up by a Lord. Here is another point which seems to us worthy attention.

"Sly. Ye are a baggage : the Slys are no rogues ; look in the chronicles ; we came in with Richard Conqueror. Therefore paucas pallabris ; let the world slide : sessa !"

Is there no hit implied in these words at Shakespeare's application for arms, and his claims to be by descent a gentleman ? As Mr Donnelly has well pointed out in his recent work, Shakespeare put forward all sorts of claims to birth and family, to which he had about as much real right as Sly. Then, in the drunkenness of Sly, is there no ironical portrait of the man of Stratford ? We know that he died from the results of a drinking bout, and Mr Donnelly certainly accuses him, with some show of reason, of being a free liver, if no worse. It is hardly fair to infer that because we have his end associated with revelry and this tale of a "drinking bout," that he was another Sly. But the story, which has never been contradicted, leaves a disagreeable impression on the mind that he must have been a hard drinker.

There must be some truth about a tradition of this sort, which has handed itself down to us undenied by any contemporary evidence. But to return to Sly's boast of illustrious descent of birth ; is it not curious that a "peasant" should be made to lay claim to anything of the sort ?

"How my men will stay themselves from laughter
When they do homage to this simple peasant."

We find that Sly is only a "simple peasant," and it is very strange and singular to find the author of the play, thus placing in his mouth, the sort of speech which a peasant would never make, and which (nobody knew better than the writer) is quite beside the mark in Sly's mouth! Now it may be objected that Shakespeare was no peasant, yet we think anybody who has seen the house he was born in, or the cottage where he lived with his wife, Anne Hathaway, must be forced to the conclusion that they both are only peasants' cottages. It seems to us that before Shakespeare went to London he lived the life of a simple peasant, poaching and drinking; and whatever he became afterwards, he was no better at Stratford than a peasant in Home and surroundings.

Is there no possible joke of the "Hang, Hog," Bacon style in the following?—

"Lord. O Monstrous beast! how like a swine he lies!
 Grim death, how foul and loathsome is thine image!
Sirs, I will practise on this drunken man.
 What think you, if he were convey'd to bed,
 Wrapped in sweet clothes, rings put upon his fingers,
 A most delicious banquet by his bed,
 And brave attendants near him when he wakes,
 Would not the beggar then forget himself?"

"How like a swine he lies!" Is there no indirect sly hint here to take us to Bacon? How like Bacon he lies! We admit the seeming extravagance of the remote parallel, but it is well to note every trifle in this extraordinary art. In Shakespeare's age the common name for pigs and swine was "Bacons."

There is something peculiarly adapted to our argument even in the name Sly. If the sly Shakespeare was guardedly keeping his tongue silent upon a matter which must touch him so nearly as the authorship of the plays, there is something in this name that hits off his position as reputed author and false author very admirably indeed. We find in the induction that he takes very quickly to his false honours, and believes himself (in a very brief time) the actual Lord, he is persuaded he is. There is something unnatural in that. No one could thus be persuaded that their entire life was a lie, or a dream, unless they had an element of slyness in them, which we see Sly undoubtedly has. For ourselves, we cannot imagine a picture better painted to portray a false authorship in relation to plays than this induction of Sly. He is brought in in relationship to plays and players or actors. And that was also Shakespeare's position over actors, who probably were in the pay of others.

Lord Bacon's coat of arms contains a double star. We should like to know the history and origin of these arms? Every trifle concerning him is interesting to those who believe that he is Shakespeare's double, and that to the star he already possesses, he promises to add another one of even greater lustre still. Over the house Goethe was born in at Frankfort, there was a lyre, a curious coincidence (if only that), to mark as it were the birthplace of one who was to take Apollo's lyre as his own. Everything in connection with Bacon's life is extraordinary. If ever there was a prophet who prophesied truly, it was him. He foretold the revolution which was to follow sixteen years after his death. Spedding writes:—

“Another thing in the paper before us, not to be found elsewhere in Bacon's writings, is the prophecy of civil wars; which he anticipates propter mores quosdam non ita pridem introductos: a prediction well worthy of remark, especially as being uttered so early as the beginning of James the First's reign.”

What Dr Rawley relates about the influence of the moon at her change (passion) or eclipse is curious, and as Rawley was Bacon's intimate chaplain, we have every reason to believe what he says:—

“It may seem the moon had some principal place in the figure of his nativity: for the moon was never in her passion, or eclipsed, but he was surprised with a sudden fit of fainting; and that though he observed not nor took any previous knowledge of the eclipse thereof; and as soon as the eclipse ceased, he was restored to his former strength again.” (“Life.”)

It appears that Bacon studied Astronomy, and had an observatory at Gorbambury, the ruins of which were, not many years ago, still visible. The British Association, when at St Albans, were very anxious to excavate, but I was told the proprietor would not give the necessary consent. It is evident from some annotations upon the title page of the original MSS. (Harl. MSS. 6463) that Bacon studied or believed in Astrology. This seems quite incredible, we admit, from the style and character of his mind and works, which everywhere denounce Alchemy, Astrology, and every non-positive science. At the bottom of the title page of "Valerius Terminus of the Interpretation by Nature," with the annotations of Hermes Stella,¹ we find in Bacon's hand:—

Philosophy

Sp. 17. 26 = 1603 6B 45. x. 1

Libri dimidiū et, pag^a 34. —

Pagellorū numerū veri. 1

There is, no doubt, some connection between the title and second title, and these astronomical notes. Both are strange titles, and unexplainable, declares Mr Spedding, who quotes Bacon's own words as to his manner of publishing. "Whereby it shall not be to the capacity nor taste of all, but shall as it were single and adopt his reader." Stella was therefore to throw a kind of starlight on the subject, enough to prevent the student's losing his way, but not much more.

Terminus seems to indicate some finality or end connected with Astrology or a star—Stella. Curiously we find, in the twenty-sixth Sonnet, reference to a star in reference to some discovery to be made with regard to the author. We do not adduce these things to excite curiosity, or to suggest we in any way can assist to solve them, but conscientiously present them to those readers who are not intimate with Bacon, to show that there is a profound mystery connected with some of his works, which his editor and life-long student, Spedding, could not fathom. If there is a mystery around Shakespeare's life, there is also a mystery around Bacon's, though of another description. It is believed that Bacon had his works translated into Latin, because he anticipated the decay of English and a possible return to the Latin as a vehicle for philosophical writings. But we are not of that belief. We think that the Latin was of course intended to serve as a common European medium or means of reading him. But we think also that the Latin was a cover for less concealed and more ambiguous language upon subjects which were, in his own words, "to adopt his reader." The translations are of course bound to agree with the seemingly simple subject in hand. It seems to us Bacon's works are often to be found employing a double language, and at random, or strained from that simplicity which he never ceases to commend in connection with words and their meaning. His entire philosophy is written to expose the idols of words and their false connotations, and to plant them deep down in Nature itself, yet he does not conform to the spirit of his teaching. We find Mr Spedding constantly at a loss, and yet unwilling to confess it, in his work of editorship. Bacon everywhere shows that his ideas and words are often very badly mated.

"Critics have discovered a multitude of contradictions and antinomies in the Baconian philosophy, because he denies in one place what he has affirmed in another. Among these antinomies, many are certainly so composed that the thesis may be found in the encyclopædian works, the antithesis in the 'Novum Organum.'" ("Francis Bacon," p. 224, by Kuno Fischer.)

"It seemed that towards the end of the sixteenth century men neither knew nor aspired to know more than was to be learned from Aristotle; a strange thing at any time; more strange than ever just then, when the heavens themselves seemed to be taking up the argument on their own behalf, and by suddenly lighting up within the very region of the Unchangeable and Incorruptible, and presently extinguishing, a new fixed star as bright as Jupiter—the new star in Cassiopeia shone with full lustre on Bacon's freshmanship—to be protesting by signs and wonders against the cardinal doctrine of the Aristotelian philosophy."

On this star the author of "Mazzaroth" says:—

"The new star seen by Tycho Brahe, in Cassiopeia, which blazed for a short time and then disappeared, sufficiently authorises us to regard this star as no meteor of our earth or sky, but as one of the heavenly bodies, pre-ordained to the glorious office of heralding, by an increase of its own brightness, the coming in splendour of Him, the true Light, by whom and for whom all things were created." (Col. i. 16.)

Upon consulting further "Mazzaroth," we find (on page 3) that Seth or Shoth or Hermes was the reputed inventor of Astronomy. "The Egyptians held that (Hermes) or Shoth—the Twice Great—was the founder of their Astronomy" (page, 3, part iv. "Mazzaroth"). So that we find a rational explanation in the title Hermes Stella, (as Astronomy,) or the Astronomical, or Astrological Star, an idea which is fully borne out by the notes in ink, (which we have quoted,) found at the foot of the title-page in the original, in Bacon's own hand. With regard to the strange title, "Valerius Terminus," we can suggest no explanation. Terminus needs no comment; it clearly means what is already an anglicised word—finality, a termination, which the second title mysteriously connects with astronomy, as is proved by the additional astrological note. Valerius is a proper name, and there are a great quantity of them in the dictionaries. Amongst them we find some artists. One, of Ostia, was the architect of the covered theatre erected at Rome for the games of Libo (Pliny, H. N., xxxvi. 15 s. 24).

We find in "Valerius Terminus" a great deal upon the anticipations of the mind, which immediately recalls how Bacon has anticipated in the "New Atlantis" the discoveries of the nineteenth century. In chapter 13 :— "Of the error in propounding chiefly the search of causes and productions of things concrete, which are infinite and transitory, and not of abstract natures, which are few and permanent. That these natures are as the alphabet or simple letters, whereof the variety of things consisteth; or as the colours mingled in the painter's shell, wherewith he is able to make infinite variety of faces or shapes."

This recalls his letter to Sir Tobie Matthew and his works of the alphabet. In chapter 18 he again mysteriously alludes to reserving a part in publication to a private succession, which I think is a pretty good hint to prove that this is what he has himself done :—

"That the discretion anciently observed, though by the precedent of many vain persons and deceivers disgraced, of publishing part, and reserving part to a private succession, and of publishing in a manner whereby it shall not be to the capacity nor taste of all, but shall as it were single and adopt his reader, is not to be laid aside, both for the avoiding of abuse in the excluded, and the strengthening of affection in the admitted."

What is the "infinite variety of faces or shapes" which he couples with the painter's art? Are they the "infinite variety of faces" of the Shakespeare Theatre which he has reserved "to a private succession (and) of publishing," which are to "single and adopt his reader." We think so, and the world will think so too ere many years go by. It is sheer nonsense for the defenders of the Shakespeare myth to stand upon their stilts, or, (like the ostrich,) to hide their heads in the sands of their prejudice and ignorance, by blanching such passages as these. Let the Americans come and take possession, if we do not take possession ourselves. After all, what are the apologists of Shakespeare defending? Merely a name, the traditions around which are anything but ennobling. All we know of Shakespeare consists in the knowledge that he was born in a dirty, squalid house, or cottage with heaps of dirt ("sterquinarum" in front of it. That he distinguished his early and classical years, not in drinking at the Castalian fount of the golden Apollo, but by deer stealing, coney catching, drinking bouts, and immorality. His life begins with the story of the celebrated drinking contests, and ends with the same pitiful tale. His wife presents him with an heir six months after marriage. He is again heard of supplanting his fellow actor Burbage in an amour. He lends money, sues for small debts, oppresses the poor (as to the inclosures of the common land), and dies leaving neither library, nor manuscript, nor record, except that he brew beer, and never taught his eldest daughter to read or write. And this is the man who overreaches three centuries of critics to understand or exhaust his learning! The human mind is a strange thing, infested with Bacon's idols, which have been more exemplified in the history of Shakespearian criticism than in aught else. There is nothing but association, that "monster custom that all sense doth eat," that bars the minds of prejudiced thousands from examining this question of authorship fairly, rationally, without bias, and in a spirit which Bacon everywhere inculcates. The less people have read Bacon or Shakespeare the more positive they are as to the authorship. This is a fact we find true every day. Others waver, and would believe, if it were not for the idol of superstition, the false idol or god who usurps the rightful heir. A curious attitude is momentary conversion and then falling back. The simple truth is, public opinion is stronger than reason. The overwhelming collective voice paralyzes the free judgment. But what judge can public opinion be upon a question of this sort, that lies deeper than the average of common education, and which few will give themselves the trouble to study as it requires to be studied? Surely the opinion of experts is more valuable than the opinion of a multitude of what Carlyle called "mostly fools!" Public opinion is sound, excellent, and invaluable in all questions of common sense. This is a literary question, embracing the profoundest possible learning, and a peculiar faculty of perceiving, comparing, or collating and analysing. No doubt it will or may become a subject open to the judgment of the average common sense. But that point has hardly been reached yet. What people want to know is why Bacon allowed another to enjoy his proper rights? The answer has been given under one head. We will give it under several others. The general explanation is the low position the stage and play-writing occupied in those days, and the serious ambitious career of law before the real author, Bacon. We think this is only half the answer. We believe it was the peculiar character of Bacon's mind which was at the bottom of it. His whole life was bent upon a revolution of philosophy and the reformation of society. Here he joins hands with the Rosicrucians. He shows in his works his delight with the reserve and concealment of Nature, and perceives that the education and discipline of man's apprenticeship in life are owing to the mystery of the Creator's works. His subtle intellect conceives the idea of imitating this secrecy, which is also part and parcel of the Rosicrucian tenets. Self-sacrifice, abnegation, absence of all personal seeking or vanity, and to come down hidden through the ages. Those were their doctrines. The plays commenced early to go to the theatre anonymously, and they had to continue to do so. But the character of Bacon's mind, as exemplified in his works, is the subtlest that the World has ever known. It is ubiquitous, it never wearies, by turns lawyer, statesman, natural scientist, antiquarian, thoroughly classical, despising the philosophy of the Greeks and Romans, calling the former children; overthrowing Aristotle at sixteen, and going back to the Egyptians, Persians, and Culdees for original authority. Anything is possible of such a god-like intellect, whose whole faculties are bent upon Posterity, and "after Ages," and who lives in thought with the nineteenth and twentieth century in discoveries. He is not satisfied with Europe or the old world. He must have a New Atlantis or America. He won't allow the centuries to outstrip him. For he is their master, and we are yet far behind him!

To those who object that no one man could find time to compass the plays, besides his already acknowledged works, we reply thus—How was it he found time to become Lord Keeper, Lord Chancellor, and write what we already have? Most men would be satisfied to fill a lifetime with one or the other. He did both. And if he did this, he could do anything.

“He died on the ninth day of April in the year 1626, in the early morning of the day, Easter Sunday, then celebrated for our Saviour’s resurrection, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, at the Earl of Arundel’s house in Highgate, near London, to which place he casually repaired about a week before.”

Those who believe like ourselves that he was more like Christ than man, both in end, aims, and sacrifice, and who further believe that he will come again to us in greater glory, as the Logos of the plays, will find the above coincidence of his death very remarkable.

With regard to Montaigne, with whose works there is so much in Bacon’s essays in common, both as to style, solidity, and profoundness, we quote the following from E. Arber’s prologue to “A Harmony of the Essays” of Bacon :—

“Bacon knew Montaigne, not only as the great French Essayist, but also as the friend of his only full-brother, Anthony. This elder son of the Lord Keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, by his second wife, the Philosopher’s mother, was wandering about the continent, chiefly in France, for eleven years, between 1579 and February 1592, during all the time England was rising to her highest effort in the struggle with Spain. In November 1582, within two years of the first appearance of Montaigne’s ‘Essais,’ and the year of their second edition, both at Bordeaux; Anthony Bacon came to that city, and there contracted a friendship with the Sieur de Montaigne. Without doubt this acquaintanceship resulted in these French ‘Essais’ being early brought under Bacon’s notice; and notwithstanding their endless ramblings from the subject, so utterly distasteful to him, the novelty of the style of writing no doubt recommended itself to him: and thus he came to note down his own observations, after the method of his own genius. So that on 30 January 1597 he could say that he published them 'as they passed long ago from my pen.'

“Yet it is strange that Bacon ignores his guide. There is no allusion by him to Montaigne in these essays before 1625, under which year he will be found quoted at p. 501. When, in 1612, he was writing his dedication to Prince Henry of his second and revised Text, it pleased him to go back to antiquity for a precedent, and to find in Seneca's ‘Epistles to Lucilius’ the prototype of the modern Essay, see p. 158.”

For those who believe, like ourselves, that Bacon was active in promoting a general reformation throughout Europe, either in league with the Rosicrucians, or in favour of Masonry, these eleven years of foreign travel of his devoted brother Anthony, are full of significance. Anthony Bacon (like Antonio in the Merchant of Venice) was ever ready with his purse to help his brother. We find him working and living with him at Gray's Inn, and finally leaving Bacon Gorbambury. It is curious to find Anthony Bacon at Bourdeaux, in communication with Montaigne. It is strange to find Anthony at Venice, whence Boccalini's “Raggugli di Parnasso” appeared. All this time—these eleven years—Anthony is in constant communication with his brother, and is himself studying deeply Foreign Politics and his age.

As to Bacon's moral character, enough has already been written upon it. These are the words of Arber in his introduction to his “Harmony of the Essays” :—

“It is contrary to human nature, that one in whose mind such thoughts as these coursed, year after year, only becoming more excellent as he grew older, could have been a bad man. Do men gather grapes of thorns? Be all the facts of his legal career what they may, and it is that section of his life mostly includes any discredit to him: (he was also a Philosopher, Historian, Essayist, Politician, and what not?) the testimony of this one work, agreeing as it does with the tenour of all his other writings is irresistible, that in the general plan of his purposes and acts, he intended nothing less, nothing else than to be 'Partaker of God's Theater, and so likewise to be partaker of God's Rest,' p. 183. Can we accuse one who so scathes Hypocrites and Imposters, Cunning and Self-wisdom, of having a corrupted and depraved nature? For strength of Moral Power, there is no greater work in the English language.

"More than this, (it is notable also as a testimony to his character,) there runs right through all an unfeigned reverence for Holy Scripture, not only as a Revelation of Authority, but as itself the greatest written Wisdom. Not because it was so easy to quote, but because it was so fundamentally and everlastingly true, did this great Intellect search the Bible as a great store-house of Civil and Moral, as well as Religious Truths, and so Bacon is another illustration, with Socrates, Plato, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton and others, that a deep religious feeling is a necessity to the very highest order of human mind. As he argues at p. 339, Man, when he resteth and assureth himselfe vpon diuine Protection and Fauour, gathereth a Force and Faith; which Human Nature, in it selfe, could not obtaine.

"Here most reluctantly we must leave off, ere we have hardly begun. One parting word. We rise from the study of this work with a higher reverence than ever for its Author; and with the certain conviction that the Name and Fame of Francis Bacon will ever increase and extend through successive ages."

In the "New Atlantis" we find the following prayer printed in capitals:—

"Lord God of Heaven and Earth, thou hast vouchsafed of thy grace to those of our ORDER (sic), to know thy works of Creation and true secrets of them, and to discern (as far as appertaineth to the generation of Men) between Divine Miracles, Works of Nature, Works of Art, and impostures and illusions of all sorts. I do here acknowledge and testify before this people, that the thing we now see before our eyes is thy Finger, and a true Miracle. And forasmuch as we learn in our books, that thou never workest Miracles, but to a divine and excellent End, (for the laws of Nature are thine own laws, and thou exceedest them not but upon good cause) we most humbly beseech thee to prosper this great sign, and to give us the Interpretation, and use of it in mercy, which thou dost in some part secretly promise, by sending it unto us."

The word "Order" is printed in large capitals. This shows that "those of our Order" refers to some secret brotherhood, or society, which we believe was no other than the famous fraternity of the brotherhood of the Rosy Cross—in short, the Rosicrucians! It behoves the present generation to solve this question satisfactorily.

How is it we find Bacon repeatedly alluding to the "Gardens of the Muses," to the immortality of poetry, in the following remarkable language? "The Gardens of the Muses keep the privilege of the golden age; they ever flourish and are in league with time. The monuments of wit survive the monuments of power: the verses of a poet endure without a syllable lost, while states and empires pass many periods. Let him not think he shall descend, for he is now upon a hill as a ship is mounted upon the ridge of a wave; but that hill of the Muses is above tempests, always clear and calm; a hill of the goodliest discovery that man can have, being a prospect upon all the errors and wanderings of the present and former times. Yea, in some cliff it leadeth the eye beyond the horizon of time, and giveth no obscure divinations of things to come."

We think that this passage is sufficiently pregnant with implied application of all this (with regard to poetry) to Bacon himself, as to constitute a confession of faith in itself. For example, can we not see in that wide survey, which Bacon associates with the hill of the Muses (Parnassus), the anticipation of Bacon's mind (in his "New Atlantis") and his wide survey of "former times," with his studies of the Persian, Chaldæan, and Egyptian antiquity? Do we not see in this hill "above tempests" the God Prospero watching the wanderings and errors of the shipwrecked King and his Courtiers ? If Bacon was no poet, and had nothing to do with the Muses or Parnassus, how does he know all this ? But compare this, "The monuments of wit survive the monuments of power :"—

" Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme."

Or take the Hermit's speech (Bacon "Device," 1594-95) :—
" If he will be in the feast and not in the throng, in the light and not in the heat ; let him embrace the life of study and contemplation. And if he will accept of no other reason, yet because the gift of the Muses will enworthy him in his love, and where he now looks on his mistress's outside with the eyes of sense, which are dazzled and amazed, he shall then behold her high perfections and heavenly mind with the eyes of judgment, which grow stronger by more nearly and more directly viewing such an object."

Nobody but a poet would or could write like this, and certainly no philosopher would think of harping on the Muses in this fashion ! Can we not see in this language ("in the feast") the author of Love's Labour's Lost, which had appeared a short time before 1588 :—

"The mind shall banquet, though the body pine :
Fat paunches have lean pates ; and dainty bits
Make rich the ribs, but bankrupt quite the wits."

Can we not see, even in the language used, a mind familiar and at home with the poetical conceits of the Italian sonneteers, who always identified philosophy and wisdom with a mistress, as in the case of Petrarch, Boccaccio, and Dante ?

We find one of the peculiarities of Bacon's mind was to look upon the past as the true youth of the world, which seems to us an entirely original conception, and which we find repeated by no one except Shakespeare. But first as to Bacon, who writes :—

"As for antiquity, the opinion touching it which men entertain is quite a negligent one, and scarcely consonant with the word itself. For the old age of the world is to be accounted the true antiquity; and this is the tribute of our own times, not of that earlier age of the world in which the ancients lived; and which, though in respect of us it was the elder, yet in respect of the world it was the younger. And truly as we look for greater knowledge of human things and a riper judgment in the old man than in the young, because of his experience and of the number and variety of the things which he has seen and heard and thought of; so in like manner from our age, if it but knew its own strength and chose to essay and exert it, much more might fairly be expected than from the ancient times, inasmuch as it is a more advanced age of the world, and stored and stocked with infinite experiments and observations."

Now this is so original, and so entirely without any contemporary parallels, that to find Shakespeare repeating it is assuredly startling:—

"If that the world and Love were young,
And truth in every shepherds tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move,
To live with thee and be thy Love."

Mystery about Bacon's Life.

In his poem of "Underwoods," there is this by Ben Jonson, addressed to Bacon on his birthday:—

"In the midst
Thou stand'st as though A MYSTERY THOU DID'ST."

Considering Ben Jonson translated Bacon's works for him into Latin, such words coming from an intimate associate who had opportunities for observation, is a most remarkable thing. Then we have that remarkable letter of Bacon to Sir Tobie Matthew, saying (1607-9):—"Those works of the Alphabet are in my opinion of less use to you where you now are than at Paris."

Rawley writes in his life of Bacon:—"Several persons of quality

during his Lordship's life crossed the seas on purpose to gain an opportunity of seeing him and discoursing with him ; whereof one carried his Lordship's Picture from Head to Foot over with him into France ; as a thing which he foresaw would be much desired there." (P. 12.)

Many readers will say there is nothing at all extraordinary in this, but they forget Bacon's works were little appreciated during his life, and of a character little likely to arouse in foreigners this unbounded curiosity and admiration. Mrs Pott says :— "There are times noted by Mr Spedding when Bacon wrote with closed doors, and when the subject of his studies is doubtful." Then there is the celebrated letter to Master John Davies, who was a poet, begging him to use his influence with the new king in Bacon's favour, and concluding, "So, desiring you to be good to all concealed poets," &c.

Bacon writes, in a letter to Sir George Villiers :—"Fame hath swift wings, especially that which hath black feathers."

As Mr Donnelly truly remarks, by "black feathers" are meant "slanders," that is, that slander is like a bird with black feathers—a crow! Now compare—

"That thou art blam'd shall not be thy defect,
For slander's mark was ever yet the fair ;
The ornament of beauty is suspect,
A crow that flies in heaven's sweeter air."

A parallel of this sort is worth a million of the ordinary parallels of the use of the same words, because the latter are external and might be plagiarisms of style or coincidences, but the above is a discovery of the internal thought arranged in two utterly different ways, and yet plainly at bottom the same. Here is another identical parallel in which the torch is introduced as an emblem of light.

"I shall perhaps, before my death, have rendered the age a light unto posterity, by kindling this new torch amid the darkness of philosophy." (Letter to King James.)

Compare—

“Heaven doth with us as we with torches do,
Not light them for themselves.”

This is the inscription upon Bacon's monument:—

FRANCISCUS BACON, BARO DE VERULAM, S^r. ALBANI VIC^{mes},

SEU NOTIORIBUS TITULIS
SCIENTIARUM LUMEN FACUNDIÆ LEX
SIC SEDEBAT.

QUI POSTQUAM OMNIA NATURALIS SAPIENTIÆ
ET CIVILIS ARCANÆ EVOLVISSET
NATURÆ DECRETUM EXPLEVIT
COMPOSITA SOLVANTUR
AN. DNI M.DC.XXVI.
ÆTAT^{is} LXVI.

TANTI VIRI
MEM.
THOMAS MEAUTUS
SUPERSTITIS CULTOR
DEFUNCTI ADMIRATOR
H. P.

This inscription (below the monument) was written by Sir Henry Wotton, and the following translation of it is copied from the “Biographia Britannica”:—“Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam, Viscount St Albans, or by more conspicuous titles—of Science the Light; of Eloquence the Law, sat thus: Who after all natural Wisdom, and Secrets of Civil Life he had unfolded, Nature's law fulfilled—‘Let Compounds be dissolved!’ In the year of our Lord 1626; of his age, 66. Of such a man that the memory might remain, Thomas Meautys, living his attendant, dead his admirer, placed this monument.”

The italics are not ours, though we are not surprised at them, for these four words, “Let Compounds be dissolved,” must astonish any attentive or thoughtful person. The Latin is “Composita Solvantur,” and is capable of other renderings besides the obvious one presented to us above. But why should it not have some other meaning than a purely physical one? There is something very strange about this expression, "Let Compounds be dissolved," which recalls Hamlet's exclamation—

"Oh that this too too solid flesh would melt, Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew."

Let us examine a little the original Latin. Upon turning to the dictionary, we find "Composita" bearing many meanings besides compounds. We do not mean to allow the bias of the fact that we are dealing with a monumental inscription to influence us. There is something sufficiently strange that we find these words following upon Naturæ Decretum Explevit, because the latter completes the necessities of the case, and to add anything more is to lay the inscription open to the charge of tautology or pleonasm. Now, it is curious that the Latin word Composita has many meanings, amongst which may be included compositions or works (and in which sense we have the name of a type-setter or compositor), from the verb to compose. It has also the meaning sometimes of false, feigned, contrived (Tac., Ann. i. 7):—

"Falsi, ac festinantes vultuque composito."

Also (Livy, iii. 10):—

"Composita fabula, Volsci belli."

Solvantur comes from a verb which means to set free, unloose, melt,—thaw,—resolve,—explain,—solve; indeed, the English word solve is directly derived from Solvere (the active verb), meaning to explain or answer. We speak and write of solving a riddle, in the sense of setting it free or unloosening it. So that Composita Solvantur may be a profound way of saying other things than the rude and strange "Let Compounds be dissolved!"

Final Remarks.

Our final belief is, that the same mind that took "all knowledge for its province," that studied the occult science of Persia, Egypt, and Chaldæa, who was plainly at the head of some secret society (prefigured in the "New Atlantis"), and whose entire life was bent upon bettering the condition of man in after ages, by freeing him of the impostures and delusions of the schools, composed these "philosophic-play-systems," in order once and for ever, by means of a pattern or exemplar of art, to prove to posterity (by means of a planned revelation) what he considered the true doctrine and spiritual meaning of the universe. This art is the brief summing up, the epitome and extract of all that is true and valuable in the philosophies of antiquity. The plays are the "process" or "artifice" by which Bacon conforms himself to "the universal insanity," which he deploras to his son. Their object is to exemplify the subtlety of Nature by a like subtlety of construction, seeing that he says:—"The subtlety of Nature is much deeper than the subtlety of the senses." He saw, we believe, that his inductive philosophy might be applied and exemplified by a counterpart of art, embracing Idealism, as apparently opposed to Realism and science, his object being to reconcile the two in one grand art scheme, where both should hold out hands to each other. He saw that this dramatic poetry might be applied to purposes of philosophic instruction. Suppose (for the sake of illustration only) that the plays are profoundly symbolical, and constructed upon a plan of entire rationalism for time to reveal. Might he not exemplify in action the four descriptions of his Idols—of the Tribe, Market-place, Theatre, and Den. It is remarkable that the actual term employed by Plato to illustrate the relationship of ideas to signs, is that of images or idols. An idol is a false image, and if we worship the external in place of the signification, we are confounding the false with the real; and from this confusion of words and of things has arisen the entire errors of which Bacon's inductive philosophy is the protest. It may seem claiming too much of any human being to imagine such a superhuman scheme possible ; but we have to deal with a remarkable age, a more remarkable man, and the most superhuman evidence of Divine Genius in plays that are as profound and as spiritual as the universe !

We find Bacon perfectly understanding the value of secrecy. He says, "But if a man be thought secret, it inviteth discovery." (Essay on Simulation and Dissimulation.) Again, "Therefore set it down : That an Habit of Secrecy is both Politic and Moral." This is placed in italics and capitals as we reproduce it. This is a curious confession to come from a writer who a little before in his essay upon Truth had written : "The Knowledge of Truth, which is the presence of it ; and the belief of Truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature." But perhaps he had a method for his contradictions. It is as well also to see that, after approving of secrecy, he shows that Dissimulation follows it by necessity. "For the second, which is Dissimulation, it followeth many times upon secrecy by a necessity ; so that he that will be secret must be a dissembler in some degree." Then he goes on to say, "The three great advantages of Simulation and Dissimulation are these. First, to lay asleep opposition, and to surprise. For where a man's intentions are published it is an Alarum to call up all that are against them. The second is to reserve to a Manself a fair Retreat." These passages were written in 1625, when he was sixty-five, and a year before his death. Coming from a man whose passionate love of truth was for truth's sake, and whose philosophy aimed at exposing every sort of imposture or sham (at an age when he had nothing further to hope or fear in this world), these words ought to constitute a hint of the deepest significance.

Identity of Art with Nature.

"And we willingly place the history of arts among the species of natural history, because there have obtained a now inveterate mode of speaking and notion, as if art were something different from nature, so that things artificial ought to be discriminated from things natural, as if wholly and generically different . . . and there has insinuated into men's minds a still subtler error—namely this, that art is conceived to be a sort of addition to nature, the proper effect of which is mere words and rhetorical ornament (which is better adapted to disquisition and the talk of literary nights than to establish philosophy)." ("Intellectual Globe," chap iii.)

Now we see here Art identified by Bacon with Nature. How is it we find Shakespeare also identifying Art with Nature in like manner?—

- "Per. Sir, the year growing ancient,—
Not yet on summer's death, nor on the birth
Of trembling winter,—the fairest flowers o' the season
Are our carnations, and streak'd gillyflowers,
Which some call nature's bastards : of that kind
Our rustic garden's barren ; and I care not
To get slips of them.
- Pol.* Wherefore, gentle maiden,
Do you neglect them ?
- Per.* For I have heard it said,
There is an art which, in their piedness, shares
With great creating nature.
- Pol.* Say, there be ;
Yet nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean : so, over that art
Which you say adds to nature, is an art
That nature makes. You see, sweet maid, we marry
A gentler scion to the wildest stock,
And make conceive a bark of baser kind
By bud of nobler race : this is an art
Which does mend nature,—change it rather ; but
The art itself is nature.
- Per.* So it is."

Not only are both passages parallels as to bearing, but the same language and correction of Perdita's error by Polixenes is employed by Bacon :—

"And there has insinuated into men's minds a still subtler error—namely this, that art is conceived to be 'a sort of addition to nature.'"

Compare :—

‘ So over that art
Which you say adds to nature is an art
That nature makes.”

Both these passages were written by the same hand, because this is a parallel that springs from within, from so rare a philosophic creed, that it is improbable and unlikely that anybody besides Bacon even held it. See how both speak of adding to Nature—so that we find the thought that Nature is Art and Art Nature, belonging to both Bacon and Shakespeare. But this is Plato's philosophy, and we make bold to conceive that this is the philosophy of the “play systems,” wherein Nature is identified with art, for philosophic purposes of instruction, which will some day indeed astonish the world into admiration. It seems, then, Bacon had given profound thought to this question. Does it not seem strange to find this rigid philosopher of the inductive method, evidently deeply acquainted with the Platonic philosophy as an Art system—a result which a good many students of Plato hardly arrive at! Nicetas (Psellus), in his “Commentaries” (Gregor Or. xlii. 1732 D.), says, “Si Orpheo credimus et Platonis et Lycio philosopho Natura dei ars quædam est.” (960 Aglaophamus Lobeck.) Let us here remark that Plato's philosophy and the Indian creed connected with Brahma and Maya, are the only systems that regard Nature as God's Art, behind which he has concealed himself, and in which phenomena play the part of illusion, perspective or idols, as images or shadows—or symbolical pictures.

With regard to this our work, the critics, and the public, we have no right to expect a better reception than Bacon himself received. The gods cannot alter Human Nature.

“In 1620 Bacon published his great work, ‘Instauratio Magna.’ The geniuses laughed at it, and men of talent and acquirement, whose studies had narrowed their minds into particular channels, incapable of understanding its reasonings, and appreciating its originality, turned wits for the purpose of ridiculing the new publication of the philosophic Lord Chancellor. Dr Andrews, a forgotten wit of those days, perpetrated a vile pun upon the town and title of St Albans, by saying some doggerel verses that it was on the high road to Dunce table, i.e., Dunstable, and therefore appropriate to the author of such a book. Mr Secretary Cuffe said it was "a book which a fool could have written, and a wise man would not." King James declared it was like the peace of God—"it passeth all understanding." Coke wrote, under a device on the title page, of a ship passing through the pillars of Hercules—

"It deserveth not to be read in schools
But to be freighted in the ship of fools."

CHAPTER XIV.

GORHAMBURY.

“Ut Rosa flos florum, sic est domus ista domorum.” (Over the door, Chapter House, Yorkminster.)

GORHAMBURY, where Bacon passed many years of his youth, was built in 1571, as we see by the inscription over the Roman Portico of the ruins:—

“Hæc cum perfecit Nicoläus tecta Baconus,
Elizabeth regni lustra fuere duo.
Factus eques, magni custos fuit ipse sigilli
Gloria sit soli, tota tributa Deo.
Mediocria firma 1571.”

It appears that upon the outside of the present approach there was formerly a piazza with a range of pillars of the Tuscan order in front. The walls of the piazza were painted al fresco, with the adventures of Ulysses, by Van Kœpen. In one piazza a statue of Henry VIII. stood, the headless trunk of which may yet be observed. In the other was a figure of Lady Bacon. In the Orchard there stood an elegant Summer House (no longer existing), “dedicated to refined conversation on the liberal arts, which were deciphered on the walls with the heads of Cicero, Aristotle, and other illustrious ancients.” This room seems to have answered to the diæta, or favourite summer room, of the younger Pliny at his beloved Laurentinum (Liber ii., Epist. 17). “This building,—the porticos suited for both seasons—a crypto-porticus, or noble gallery, over the other—and finally, towers placed at different parts, recall to mind many things of the villa.”

There was a statue of Orpheus, which stood at the entrance to the orchard, and there were the following lines over it, which seem singularly appropriate for the home of the greatest poet the world has ever seen !

“ Horrida nuper eram aspectu latebræque ferarum
 Ruricolis tantum numinibusque locus
 Edomitor fausto hic dum forte supervenit Orpheus
 Ulterius qui me non sinit esse rudem
 Convocat avulsis virgulta virentia truncis
 Ed sedem quæ vel Diis placuisse potest.
 Sicque mei cultor, sic est mihi cultus et Orpheus ;
 Floreat O noster cultus amorque diu.”

In “The Wisdom of the Ancients,” Bacon quotes the fable of Orpheus, which seems to illustrate these Latin lines. “So great was the power and alluring force of this harmony that he drew the woods and moved the very stones to come and place themselves in an orderly and decent fashion about him.”

Compare Shakespeare :—

“ Therefore the poet
 Did feign that Orpheus drew trees, stones and floods ;
 Since nought so stockish, hard, and full of rage,
 But music for a time doth change his nature.”

(Merchant of Venice, vi.)

“ But the most excellent remedy, in every temptation, is that of Orpheus, who, by loudly chanting and resounding the praises of the gods, confounded the voices, and kept himself from hearing the music of the Sirens ; for divine contemplations exceed the pleasures of sense, not only in power but also in sweetness.” (“The Sirens,” Bacon.)

Considering that Orpheus was the supposed founder of the Mysteries, and that he seems to be a fit emblem of the most inspired poetry, (and particularly the Platonic or Love philosophy,) nothing could be more appropriate than to thus hear of his statue at Gorhambury. Perhaps Bacon wrote these lines, or they first implanted in his mind the idea to write philosophical play systems to illustrate the Orphic theology, for he seems to have taken the last line for his motto. Certain it is that he has come nearer

Orpheus than Orpheus himself, for he has and will draw all the world after him with his divine music for ever! Amongst some dedicatory verses to the memory of Bacon, prefixed to the "Advancement of Learning," 1640 (Oxford), and entitled Manes Verulamianiani, we find some curious things which we think we ought to introduce here. We find in these Latin verses addressed to Bacon's memory, a frequent allusion to the Muses, Apollo, Castalia, Pegassus, Helicon, and other poetical or classical conceits, that seem strangely out of harmony with the memory of a rigid philosopher. We suppose the critics will say this was the extravagant way of writing in those days:—

"Qualis per umbras Ditis Euridice vagans
 Palpare gestiit orphæum, quali Orphæus,
 Saliente tandem (vix prius crispâ) Styge,
 Alite fibras lyræ titillavit manu ;
 Talis plicata Philologon ænigmatis
 Petiit Baconum vindicem, tali manu
 Lactata cristas extulit Philosophia :
 Humique soccis repitantem Comicis
 Non proprio Ardelionibus molimine
 Sarsit, sed Instauravit. Hinc politius
 Surgit cothurno celsiore, et Organo
 Stagirita virbius reviviscit Novo."

Compare Warburton's "Divine Legation" (book ii. sect. iv), where he states Orpheus instituted the Mysteries. "So Orpheus is said to get to hell by the power of his harp:—

Threïcia fretus cithara, fidibusque canoria." (263.)

"Orpheus, as we have said, first brought the mysteries from Egypt into Thrace, and even religion itself: hence it was called Θρηξία, as being supposed the invention of the Thracian." ("Divine Legation," bk. ii. sect. iv. 232.)

"Had an old poem, under the name of Orpheus, intituled, A DESCENT INTO HELL, been now extant, it would, probably, have shown us, that no more was meant than Orpheus's initiation; and that the idea of Virgil's sixth book was taken from thence." (P. 264, "Divine Legation.")

“The verses which go under the name of Orpheus, are, at least, more ancient than Plato and Herodotus: though since interpolated. It was the common opinion, that they were genuine; and those who doubted of that, yet gave them to the earliest Pythagorians. The subject of them are the mysteries, under the several titles of Θρονισμοὶ μητρῶν τελεταί, ἱερὸς λόγος, and ἡ εἰς ἄδου κατάθασις. Pausanias tells us, that Orpheus’s hymns were sung in the rites of Ceres in preference to Homer’s.” (“Divine Legation,” 233, ibid.)

“Si potuit manis arcessere conjugis Orpheus,
Thracia fretus cithara fidibusque canoris:
Si fratrem Pollux alterna morte redemit,
Itque reditque viam toties: quid Thesea magnum,
Quid memorem Alciden? et mi genus ab Jove summo.”

Compare:—

““The riot of the tipsy Bacchanals,
Tearing the Thracian singer in their rage.”—
That is an old device; and it was play’d
When I from Thebes came last a conqueror.”—
—Midsummer-Night’s Dream.

Why do we introduce all this, and what bearing can it have upon Bacon or the plays and poems? Simply this, that we recognize in the passage quoted, in memory of Bacon (prefixed to our folio (1640) of the “Magna Instauratio”), a writer who knows more of Bacon than can be safely put in plain language, but who presents us with the most tremendous side hint or parallel in Orpheus it is possible to imagine, seeing we are at once referred to the Mysteries and the most inspired poetry.

Gorhambury was the fourth house built upon the estate. It cost £1898, exclusive of timber and lime, sand and freestone, brought from the Abbey of St Albans. It was five years building. The building consisted of a quadrangle seventy feet square, inside which was the entrance we see now, called the Roman porch. Elizabeth paid her visit in 1572, and again in May 1577. The cost of the four days’ entertainment amounted to £577, 6s. 7½d. The items are curious : Flour, £47, 12s. 6d. ; Beer, £24, 16s. 8d. ; Wine, £57, 5s. 8d. ; Milk, 6d. ; Lights, £40, 18s. 1d. ; Fowl, £108, 12s. 11d. The guests or servants stole pewter to the value of £6, 15s. 6d. In 1601 Bacon succeeded to the estate ; he found the house, though only thirty-three years old, very dilapidated, so he set to work to build another near the Ichabod Ponds.¹ In 1665, Verulam House (of which there is a detailed account by Aubrey) was pulled down and the materials sold. The old house was patched up, and in 1778 the present mansion of the Grimstons' (who took the title of Earls Verulam with the estates) was built. The present entrance to the park is not the original one of Bacon's time, which can, however, still be traced by a few stately relicts of a once magnificent avenue. This may be followed in front of the cricket-field, leading at right angles to the present road, down the park in the direction of the wooded heights. Everything about Gorhambury is very beautiful.

The " Kiss Oak " is not far from Temple House, the old ruins of Bacon's dwelling-place. It is a magnificent old tree riven frequently by lightning, perfectly hollow within, yet green and flourishing outside, as if its immortality, like Bacon's, defied age, decay, storm, or corruption. We easily got inside it, and found it wide enough to extend our two arms at full length. Up above were six large holes showing the sky overhead. The wood was as rotten as tinder, crumbling under the touch, but the marvellous part of its energy is to be seen in its perfectly green appearance outside. We should say it must be quite twenty-four feet in circumference, but this is only a rude guess. It seemed to recall those lines in The Tempest of Jupiter :—

“To the dread rattling thunder
Have I given fire and rifted Jove's stout oak
With his own bolt.”

The ruins of the old house Bacon lived in are very lovely, but in a very neglected condition. They go still by the name of the Temple ; and what better name could they bear than this, seeing that it was for many years the hallowed home of the greatest of God's inspired representatives ?

Knight writes in his “Pictorial England” :—“In the house lately occupied by Messrs Roake & Varty in the Strand, is preserved part of an old ceiling, the last remnant of York House, where Bacon was born.”

“The house in which he lived” (says Knight) “was burned down in 1676, but No. 1 of Gray's Inn Square stands upon its site. The walls of the chambers on the north side of the staircase are covered with the wainscot rescued from the fire. In the gardens, a very few years ago, were some trees that he had planted. The author of ‘London and its Environs described’ (Dodsley, 1761), makes mention (iii. 58) of a summer-house which once stood in the gardens, and bore a Latin inscription to the effect that Bacon erected it in 1609, in memory of Jeremy Bettenham, formerly a Reader of Gray's Inn :—

“‘Till lately there was a summer-house erected by the great Sir Francis Bacon upon a small mount. The inscription in memory of Bettenham was as follows :—

‘FRANCISCUS BACON
Regis Solicitor Generalus
Executor testamenti Jeremiæ Bettenham, nuper Lectoris hujus hospitii viri innocentis, abstinentis, et contemplativi hanc sedem in memoriam ejusdem Jeremiæ extruxit.
An. Dom. 1609.’”

A trifle like this bespeaks more for Bacon's character and tenderness of heart than volumes of panegyric !

Aubrey's Gossip.

"His Lordship was a good Poet, but conceal'd as appears by his Letters." (Aubrey.)

"John Aubrey, in his MS. notes, the dedication of which to Anthony Wood is dated 15th June 1580, which are printed at the end of Letters written by eminent persons, &c. London. 1813. gives us the following further information about Lord Bacon.

"In his Lordship's prosperity Sr. Fulke Grevil, Lord Brooke, was his great friend and acquaintance, but when he was in disgrace and want, he was so unworthy as to forbid his butler to let him have any more small beer, which he had often sent for, his stomach being nice, and the small beere of Grayes Inne not liking his pallet. This has done his memorie more dishonour then Sr Ph. Sydney's friendship engraven on his monument hath donne him honour.

"Richard, Earle of Dorset, was a great admirer and friend of the Ld. Ch. Bacon, and was wont to have Sr Tho. Ballingsley along with him to remember and putt downe in writing my Lord's sayinges at table. Mr. Ben Ionson was one of his friends and acquaintance, as doeth appeare by his excellent verses on his Lordship's birth day, in his 2nd vol. and in his 'Underwoods,' where he gives him a character, and concludes, That about his time, and within his view, were borne all the witts that could honour a nation or help studie. He came often to Sr John Danvers at Chelsey. Sir John told me that when his Lordship had wrote the 'Hist. of Hen. 7,' he sent the manuscript copie to him to desire his opinion of it before it 'twas printed. Qd Sir John, Your Lordship knowes that I am no scholar. 'Tis no matter, said my Lord, I know what a scholar can say; I would know what you can say. Sir John read it, and gave his opinion what he misliked (which I am sorry I have forgott) which my Lord acknowledged to be true, and mended it. 'Why,' said he, 'a schollar would never have told me this.'

“Mr Tho. Hobbes (Malmesburiensis) was beloved by his Lordship, who was wont to have him walke in his delicate groves, when he did meditate: and when a notion darted into his mind, Mr Hobbes was presently to write it downe, and his Lordship was wont to say that he did it better than any one els about him; for that many times, when he read their notes he scarce understood what they writt, because they understood it not clearly themselves. In short, all that were great and good loved and honoured him. Sir Edward Coke, Ld. Chiefe Justice, alwayes envyed him, and would be undervaluing his laws. I knew old lawyers that remembered it.

“He was Lord Protector during King James’ progresse into Scotland, and gave audience in great state to Ambassadors in the banquetting house at Whitehall. His Lordship would many time have musique in the next roome where he meditated. The Aviary at Yorke House was built by his Lordship; it did cost 300 lib. Every meale, according to the season of the yeare, he had his table strewed with sweet herbes and flowers, which he sayd did refresh his spirits and memorie. When his Lordship was at his country house at Gorhambery, St Alban’s seemed as if the court had been there, so nobly did he live. His servants had liveries with his crest;¹ his watermen were more employed by gentlemen then even the kings.

“He was wont to say to his servant, Hunt, (who was a notable thrifty man, and loved this world, and the only servant he had that he could never gett to become bound for him) ‘The world was made for man (Hunt), and not man for the world.’ Hunt left an estate of 1006 lib. per ann., in Somerset.

“None of his servants durst appeare before him without Spanish leather bootes: for he would smell the neates leather, which offended him.

“His Lordship being in Yorke House garden looking on Fishers as they were throwing their nett, asked them what they would take for their draught; they answered so much: his Lordship, would offer them no more but so much. They drew up their nett, and it were only 2 or 3 little fishes. His Lordship, then told them, it had been better for them to have taken his offer. They replied, they hoped to haue a better draught; but, said his Lordship, ‘Hope is a good breakfast, but an ill supper.’

“Upon his being in disfavour, his servants suddenly went away, he compared them to the flying of the vermin when the house was falling.

“One told his Lordship it was now time to look about him. He replied, ‘I doe not looke about me, I looke above me.’

“His Lordship would often drinke a good draught of strong beer (March beer) to-bed-wards, to lay his working fancy asleep: which otherwise would keepe him from sleeping great part of the night.

“Three of his Lordship’s servants [Sir Tho. Meautys, Mr . . . Bushell, Mr . . . Idney.] kept their coaches, and some kept race-horses.

“. . . His Favourites tooke bribes, but his Lop. alwayes gave judgement secundem æquum et bonum. His Decrees in Chancery stand firme, there are fewer of his decrees reverst, than of any other Chancellor.

“[Aubrey in his ‘Life of Hobbes,’ Vol. II. Part ii. p. 602 of the same work, states. ‘The Lord Chancellor Bacon loved to converse with him. He assisted his Lordship in translating severall of his essayes into Latin, one I well remember is that, Of the Greatness of Cities: [? Kingdoms] the rest I haue forgott. His Lordship was a very contemplative person, and was wont to contemplate in his delicious walks at Gorhambery, and dictate to Mr Bushell, or some other of his gentlemen, that attended him with ink and paper ready to set downe presently his thoughts.’]

“Mr Hobbes told me that the cause of his Lordship’s death was trying an experiment. As he was taking an aire in a coach with Dr Witherborne (a Scotchman, Physician to the King) towards Highgate, snow lay on the ground, and it came into my Lord's thoughts, why flesh might not be preserved in snow as in salt. They were resolved they would try the experiment presently. They alighted out of the coach, and went into a poore woman's house at the bottome of Highgate hill, and bought a hen, and made the woman exenterate it, and then stuffed the bodie with snow, and my Lord did help to doe it himselfe. The snow so chilled him, that he immediately fell so extremely ill, that he could not returne to his lodgings, (I suppose they at Graye's Inne,) but went to the Earl of Arundell's house at Highgate, where they putt him into a good bed warmed with a panne, but it was a damp bed that had not been layn in about a yeare before, which gave him such a cold that in 2 or 3 dayes, as I remember he [Mr Hobbes] told me, he dyed of suffocation." (Vol. II. Part i. p. 221-7.)

THE END.
